IN 1822 an Address was presented to King George the Fourth by the House of Commons, representing "that the editions of the works of the ancient historians of Britain were incorrect, and defective; that many of their writings still remain in manuscript, and in some cases in a single copy only; and that an uniform and convenient edition of the whole, published under His Majesty's royal sanction, would be an undertaking honourable to His Majesty's reign, and conducive to the advancement of historical and constitutional knowledge;" and praying, that "His Majesty would be graciously pleased to give such directions as His Majesty in His wisdom might think fit for a publication of a complete edition of the Ancient Historians of the realm."

His Majesty accordingly directed the then existing body of Commissioners on the Public Records to take steps for carrying into effect the recommendations of the Address.

As a component part of the plan determined upon by the Commissioners, it was resolved to publish separately such documents as related solely to the Principality of Wales; and the conduct of this department was entrusted to the late Humphries Parry, Esquire, whose decease occurred before any progress had been made by him in the collection of the materials.

The task then devolved upon the present Editor, accompanied with instructions to ascertain—what manuscripts remained,—which of them were available,—but, primarily, those treating upon the ancient Laws.

The question here arose, whether a new edition of the Leges Wallicæ, edited by Dr. Wotton, would not suffice? But after a careful examination of that work, all intention of reprinting it was reluctantly abandoned.

It was apparent that the sense of the text was admirably rendered, and the notes and glossary worthy of the accomplished coadjutors in these labours: but the plan upon which Dr. Wotton proceeded with the Leges Wallicæ was the adoption of one form of laws as the foundation of his text, interspersed with which were various readings, which differed widely from the text, and sometimes were contradictory of it. The cause of this anomaly was unexplained, and upon its being investigated it appeared that there were three distinct forms of laws existing, the parts of which had been dislocated by the Editor, and so arranged as to suit the order of the manuscript which he had adopted as his text, from the conviction of its being the most ancient and uniform of the whole.

Upon further research these three independent codes were found to belong respectively to Venedotia or North Wales, Dimetia or South Wales, and one adapted to Gwent or South-east Wales. The dialect of each class of copies corroborated this supposition, which was established by allusions in them which dissipated all doubt.

It was therefore evident that justice could not be done to the subject without allotting to each respectively its proper station, by which the discrepancies above alluded to are satisfactorily explained, the contrary usages of each district rightly attributed, and the consistency of each class of Codes preserved. Consequently a re-modelling of the materials became necessary.

The manuscripts which Dr. Wotton used were principally those which are preserved in the British Museum.

The mist of obscurity envelopes all accounts of the ancient institutions of the island of Britain. References are made to laws ordained by Dyvnwal moel mud, an ancient regulus in the west, and allusions to them will be found in the body of this Work; and some triads ascribed to him are given in Book XIII., but these, although they contain ordinances likely to obtain in a primitive state of society, have no warrant of authenticity. We find mention of Laws of Marsia, of an equal apocryphal origin. We know only that the British institutions resembled those of Gaul, and continued without innovation until the time when Claudius made considerable progress in the subjugation of the Britons, and introduced with the Roman arms the Roman jurisprudence. This must necessarily have exercised great influence in the amelioration of the island customs, and contributed to their assimilation with those of their continental rulers. In the southern districts the greatest impression was made, and the acceptance by Cogidubnus of the office of legate evinces the preponderance thus acquired, which must have been strengthened by the efforts of Hadrian and Caracalla to render the laws uniform throughout the vast extent of the Roman empire. After their departure merciless inroads and devastations must have nearly obliterated the traces of civilization; various customs were locally established, and the reconstruction of legal ordinances from time to time was rendered imperative by the evils arising from strife and anarchy.

Little has descended to us of the usages in early ages, but the establishment of some system of administration of laws, not widely different from those attributed to Howel dda, is attested by concessions of privileges,—one to the men of Arvon by Run, in the sixth century,—another, in imitation of the former, to the inhabitants of Powys by Cadwallon, in the seventh; which privileges consist of exemptions from the operation of particular laws found to have been in force, and embodied in the Codes subsequently regulated at the great assembly at the White House.

About the commencement of the tenth century we find Howel dda or Howel the good a conspicuous king in South Wales, in the government of which he succeeded his father Cadell. He inherited from his mother Elen possessions in Powys, and his influence appears to have been powerful throughout North Wales.

To him are we indebted for the collections of laws which pass under the name of the Laws of Howel dda, and which constitute the chief contents of this volume.

The measures he adopted for the amendment of the laws of Wales are briefly set out in the prefaces or prologues which commence the several versions of them printed in the following pages. Perceiving the laws and customs of the country to be violated with impunity, and to be falling into desuetude, he caused them to be examined, that so what was wholesome and beneficial might be retained, what was ambiguous might be expounded, and what was superfluous or prejudicial might be abrogated.

Having summoned the archbishop of Menevia, other bishops and the chief of the clergy, the nobles of Wales, and six persons (four laymen and two clerks) from each comot, to meet at a place called Y Ty Gwyn ar Dav, or the White House on the river Tav¹, he repaired thither in person; and having spent all the Lent in prayer and fasting, he selected from the whole assembly twelve of the most experienced persons, and added to their number a clerk or doctor of laws, named Blegywryd. To these thirteen was confided the task of examining, retaining, expounding, and abrogating.

The compilation of laws, which resulted from their labours, was, when completed, read through, allowed, and proclaimed; and Howel caused three copies of them to be written, one of which was to accompany the court for daily use, another was deposited in the court at Aberfraw, and a third at Dinevwr.

That nothing might be wanting to strengthen the observance of these laws, sentence of excommunication was denounced against all transgressors, and soon after Howel went to Rome, attended by the archbishop of St. David's, the bishops of Bangor and St. Asaph, and thirteen other personages. The laws were recited before the Pope, and confirmed by his authority; upon which Howel and his companions returned home.

This numerous convocation, consisting of about 170 prelates and of about 836 deputies from the comots, was convened to obtain the necessary information for the guidance of those intrusted with the compilation of the Code. In the comots the lowest courts of judicature were held, and their proceedings might be more anomalous than those of the higher courts, and it was necessary, from the experience and information of the deputies, to ascertain their governing principles, what reforms were required, and in what manner they could be best effected. Subsequently Venedotia and Powys, on account of their local customs, which could not be abrogated, required one code, South Wales and Gwent another, with suitable modifications adapted to each district.

It is not easy to reconcile the various dates assigned by commentators for the meeting of the congress at the White House. Camden and William Salisbury supposed it to be 914, in conformity with the manuscript preserved at Jesus College, Oxford. Spelman quotes a manuscript which fixes 926 as the date, but he prefers 940, the time assigned in the History of Wales; and to the latter opinion E. Llwyd subscribes. Taylor supposes that it was not held before 942. Dr. Wotton himself appears to have considered that these Laws were instituted previous to the time that Howel succeeded to the sovereignty over all Wales. In Dr. Clarke's preface to Dr. Wotton's Leges Wallicæ, 943 is conjectured to have been the date, and is thus obtained:—It is recorded in Powel's edition of Caradoc of Llancarvan that Howel's Laws were enacted after Anlaf king of the Danes had embraced christianity, and before the expulsion of the Danes from Northumberland. Now, according to the Saxon Chronicle, Edmund expelled the Danes in 944, which was the second year after Anlaf's baptism. Consequently the mesne period will be 943.

There appear to be no conclusive reasons adduced by the foregoing authorities for setting aside the accounts given in the earlier existing Chronicles relating to these occurrences. Some confusion arises from the events of a decade being detailed without intervening yearly dates, in some of the Manuscript Chronicles, which in others are supplied; but their relations are nearly uniform, and none of them assign so late a period as 940 for Howel's journey to Rome.¹ The arguments of the various writers on the subject, epitomised above, apply to the History of Wales by Powel, &c., in which information from other sources is interspersed in the text. The cause of the supremacy ascribed to Howel over Wales in the prefaces to the Laws has not been detailed; we are therefore ignorant of the extent of it, and the manner in which it was enforced. William of Malmsbury says, — “Æthelstanus Ludwalum, regem omnium Wallensium, et Constantinum, regem Scottorum, cedere regnis compulit,” — which implies a supremacy to have been generally acknowledged. The Venedotian preface styles Howel Prince of all Cymru or Wales; the Dimetian also has King of all Cymru; the Gwentian enumerates his territories as Cymru in its bounds, to wit, three-score and four cantrevs (corruptly, apparently, for one score) in South Wales, eighteen cantrevs of Gwynedd, three-score trevs beyond the Cyrchell (constituting the cantrev of Maclienydd), and three-score trevs of Buallt (comprising the cantrev of Buallt). This excludes Gwent from being under his domination; yet Blegywryd, the scribe selected to arrange the laws, is in a Dimetian preface styled Archdeacon of Llandav, and Morgeneu and Cynverth, the compilers of the Gwentian Code, are stated to have been present at the assembly.

So memorable an epoch could not well be greatly mis-stated in any accounts nearly cotemporaneous with the occurrence.

There is in the Harleian collection of the British Museum a Manuscript, marked 3859, which has every appearance of having been written in Dimetia during the sway of Owain son of Howel dda, or a transcript of one of that date. It contains, among other matter, a chronicle of events from A.D. 444 to A.D. 954, where the register terminates. This series is followed by the pedigree of Owain, traced through his father Howel and his mother Elen. As the later entries appear to have been coeval with the events, and the pedigrees afford a curious instance of the manner in which the descents of both Saxon and Welsh princes in early ages were deduced, it may not be considered irrelevant to here supply extracts from them.¹ From similar materials

Howel's death, which occurred about 948, was greatly regretted by his people, to whom he had endeared himself by persevering in the same wise course, which had procured his elevation to sovereign power.

Subsequently Bleddyn, about 1080, made extensive innovations in the laws of the Northern portion of the principality. He altered the quantities of land assigned to each at the various divisions among heirs. He remodelled the ordinances as to theft, by instituting full satisfaction instead of the fines obtaining in the time of Howel. So considerable were the alterations effected that litigants were allowed to choose by which institutions they would be judged; those of Bleddyn, or those of Howel. Gruffudd ab Cynan shortly after reformed the canons which regulated the bards and minstrels, but is not said to have interfered with the law courts. Owen Gwynedd, his son, who succeeded about 1137, admitted the consecration of the bishops of St. Asaph by the archbishop of Canterbury. In South Wales Rys about the same period, with the consent of the country, increased the prices imposed upon cattle in the laws, and extended the valuations to animals upon which hitherto no legal price had been assessed. He also accepted the office of justiciary of South Wales from Henry II. After the death of Owen Gwynedd, his son David, who succeeded to his authority, studied to introduce the Norman laws, to which his connexion with the English court by his marriage with Emma, sister of Henry II., may have contributed. Under the remaining independent Welsh princes the assimilation of the jurisprudence of the two countries continued, and some causes in the reigns of John and Henry III., in which persons connected with the principality were parties, were tried according to the Norman laws.

The duty of recording the struggles of the early inhabitants of Wales to live independently of the domination of the Romans, and in later times the successes and reverses attendant upon the endeavour to recover lost rights, or to retain the remnant of former dominion, the Editor will leave to the historian of Wales.

The annexation of Wales to England, as an integral part of the latter, in 1282, ensued upon the death of Llewelyn, its last king, in the reign of king Edward the First; and soon after various changes were produced in its laws and customs by the enactment of the Statute of Rothelan.

The LAWS AND INSTITUTES OF WALES are here given in six distinct parts: the three first of these are the Venedotian, the Dimetian, and the Gwentian Codes; the fourth part consists of the Welsh or Anomalous Laws; the fifth is made up of two versions of the Dimetian Code, in Latin, and a fragment, also in Latin; and the sixth part is occupied by the Statuta de Rothelan.

By the relation that Howel dda ordered one copy to be deposited at Aberfraw for Venedotia, another at Dinevwr for South Wales, and one for use in his own daily court, it would appear that they were uniform: how far this was the case we cannot now ascertain. Shortly after a variance must have occurred, as attested by the remains which have descended to us, and a necessity arose for Codes to comprise the respective ordinances and usages prevalent in each district. Indisputably to evince this position, the second Latin Manuscript, beginning at page 808 postea, after giving a transcript of the Dimetian form, proceeds to enumerate the three accessaries of murder, arson, and theft, as defined by the men of Venedotia and Powys; those of Venedotia coinciding precisely with such as are given under that head in the Venedotian Code (pages 106, 107, 117, 125 postea).

As the Venedotian form contains frequent mention of Jorwerth, or Edward, who appears to have been the compiler of that particular exemplar, so also various passages in other Manuscripts make frequent mention of judges as the authors of particular books; and the original venerable book of the White House is often said to have been consulted by these authors. Thus the codes which have descended to us are compilations from age to age, as the progress of the community required, and may be considered to afford a view of the legal practices in use at the periods of the various transcripts. This supposition led to classing them according to the apparent dates of the Manuscripts, employing the most ancient as the texts, and introducing [within brackets] supplementary matter afforded by later Manuscripts, wherein additional laws are found or glosses introduced.

The VENEDOTIAN CODE, said to be the compilation of Jorwerth, son of Madog, son of Raawd, contains allusions to alterations of the laws of Howel dda by Bleddyn, Prince of North Wales, about 1080. Moreover, as originally drawn the laws of Howel were classified as the laws of the court, the laws of the country, and the administration of both, but as the line of demarcation between these classes is sometimes scarcely traceable, and as we find frequent interpolations, the relevancy of which to the context is not clear, we may unhesitatingly affirm that Howel's laws have undergone numerous amendments. In this Code are included local customs, such as privileges peculiar to Arvon; the nomination of judges exclusively by the prince; perpetual state of bondage of the villains; and other matters which a perusal of this code in connexion with the explanations given in later laws will exemplify.

In the DIMETIAN CODE also we find mention of alterations made by Rys, son of Grufudd, Prince of that district, about 1180; peculiar local ordinances, such as the heriots of the castellains, and of the holders of the seven bishop houses in Dimetia; privilege of adjudging causes attached to every landowner; conditional state of bondage, and emancipation therefrom in the ninth descent, &c.

The GWENTIAN CODE omits all matter peculiar to Dimetia. It is asserted to be the compilation of Cynnerth and his father Morgenau, both of whom are enumerated, in some later matter in Book VII., among the judges summoned by Howel to attend his congress. It contains an account of territorial divisions peculiar to Gwent, and the arrangement of the materials is also different.

The ANOMALOUS OR WELSH LAWS constitute an important portion of the Work. Under this head are given such anomalous chapters as are respectively found in those Manuscripts which afforded the texts for the regular Codes, and also all additional and later matter, wherever found. Herein are comprehended legal dicta and decisions, pleadings, and elucidatory matter. From the Myvyrian Archaiology, Triads, styled the Triads of Dyvnwal moel mud (who was an ancient king of Britain), have been printed; as explanatory of many obscure passages in the laws, they are of the greatest importance: their antiquity is very dubious, but in their present form and phraseology they may be attributed to the sixteenth century. The fourteen exclusive privileges granted to Arvon by Run in the sixth century, as detailed in Book II. Chap. II., of the Venedotian Code, are imitated by fourteen privileges accorded shortly after to Powys by Cadwallon. They are nowhere enumerated but in a Poem composed by Cynddelw about 1160, of which the version contained in Book XV. of the Anomalous Laws has been also taken from the Myvyrian Archaiology.

The fifth portion of this work consists of three Latin transcripts, and is entitled LEGES WALLICÆ. The first transcript, which commences at page 771, is a short but complete digest of the Dimetian form of the Welsh laws. It does not exactly correspond in method or arrangement with any existing Welsh copies of that class, and probably has been translated from a Manuscript of an early date. Devices to illustrate the matter having been interspersed, it was considered expedient to copy them and insert them in their relative positions in the printed text. The orthography of the Manuscript has been adhered to, with the exception of emendations of occasional inaccuracies. The original is written with very numerous contractions, which, as offering considerable impediments to facility of reading, have been printed in extenso. Numerous Welsh words and passages, which had not been translated by the scribe, are now rendered into Latin, and inserted between brackets, as glosses, to supply that deficiency. Some passages also being obscure, conjectural emendations are supplied and bracketed in a similar manner.

The second transcript begins at page 808. Its orthography is not so contracted as that of the preceding one; but the same consideration which induced the extension of the words in the former has been the cause of this text being similarly treated. It is a Dimetian version, not much unlike the rendering given in the first. In the latter part examples are introduced of the mode pursued, in Powys and Venedotia, of wording various laws; and altogether it affords a very interesting compilation.

The third Latin transcript begins at page 854. It contains only some fragments of the laws of the court, and is printed in its contracted orthography, as affording an exemplar of the method pursued at the period of its transcription.

The sixth and last portion comprises the STATUTA DE ROTHELAN, which are entitled, in the large edition of the Statutes, "Statuta Walliæ." They were passed in the 12th year of Edward the First (1284), and gave the finishing stroke to the independence of Wales. Though less calculated to excite interest than the matter which precedes them, and though many of the enactments have been superseded by later laws, yet, as they constitute an epoch in the history of Wales, and are the foundation of those changes which have ever since influenced its condition, they deserve the special attention of the antiquary, the lawyer, and the historian.

In this edition of the Laws it has been considered of importance to print the whole of the texts in the orthography afforded by the Manuscripts, rather than alter them according to the modern method, which would have obscured the style of each, and have rendered it difficult to appreciate their respective antiquity and authority. Edward Llwyd, in his Archæologia Britannica, has introduced a list of the Manuscripts known to him, with some remarks as to the dates of particular transcripts. He instances the Black Book of Caermarthen, now in the Hengwrt collection, as one of the most ancient; the first part, especially, of such antiquity that he observes, "The former part of this book is in a large fair character, and seems considerably older than the latter; and the latter might possibly have been transcribed by that noted bard Kündhelu Brýdydh maur, or at least in his time, which was about the year 1160." Certainly the first glance at this book would induce acquiescence in his opinion, but further investigation will show that the whole is of one uniform handwriting. In the former part, considered by him to be the most ancient, there is an elegy upon Howel son of Goronwy, son of Edwin, son of Owain, son of Howel dda, who was killed by the agency of the Normans in the Vale of Tywi in 1104. The latter part furnishes transcripts of three pieces by Cynddelw, but so inaccurate as to militate against the opinion that the bard himself could have transcribed them. The internal evidence shows that it was a collection of poetical pieces, apparently made about the end of the twelfth or the commencement of the thirteenth century, by the monks of the priory near Caermarthen, and, therefore, not so ancient as the Manuscript A. The orthography of the two is not dissimilar, varying no more than unsettled usage would occasion. Soon after, or about 1250, we find the letter ú to have been introduced in lieu of v, u, or w, which generally obtained until about 1600, when w again became prevalent; f and v were indiscriminately used until the letter v was represented by f, and f by ff, which continue to the present time. In the older Manuscripts the radical letters only are generally given; the inflections, for which distinct characters are now in use, were implied by the reader's knowledge of the language. When the ú became general a more regular system becomes perceptible, although radical letters mostly obtain.

To advert even cursorily to the leading topics which swell this volume would lead to exceeding the limits usually assigned to a preface. In justice, however, to that race whose spirits and whose laws have alike slumbered for so many ages, the Editor cannot fail to observe, that the manner in which the exercise of sovereign power has been guarded and controlled; the careful distinction between the legislative and executive authority; the wise caution shown in confiding as little as possible to magisterial discretion; the exact delineation of the rights and duties of the governor and governed, husband and wife, parent and child, master and servant; the enlightened provision made for upholding the arts and sciences; the generous care testified for the ministers of religion; the esteem and privileges awarded to learned and scientific persons; the acquaintance with political institutions; the concern shown for the interests of commerce; the accurate definition of crimes and offences, and the just adaptation of penalties and punishments to them;—all these and many more points, mingled, it is true, with many imperfections, evince a degree of refinement which would be matter of surprise for so early an age, did we not know that the primitive Britons had had Roman preceptors, and that their institutes had been partially purified in the stream of time from the barbarism that has always distinguished the infancy of those states which have not been planted by a nation already civilized.

Numerous Welsh terms have occurred, the full meaning of which it was difficult to convey in English, except in a circumlocutory way. Other words and phrases have been rendered into English, indeed, but the justness of the interpretation is not free from doubt. For the purpose of explaining the former, and to afford the Welsh linguist an opportunity to examine the latter, a short GLOSSARY has been added.

The notes are commonly referred to by a small numeral: thus, (1); and in special cases by a small Italic letter: thus, (*). Explanatory foot-notes are distinguished by a Roman letter: thus, (A).

There is also used another mark, called a tick: thus, ('). In the body of the text this mark shows the end of the passage, for which a various reading is to be found; and in the notes a corresponding tick has been placed immediately after the numeral or Italic letter.

In cases where two or more Manuscripts vary as to the length of the passage about which they differ, the point in the text at which each terminates is marked by one or more ticks, according to the number of conflicting Manuscripts: thus, (') (") (""') (""") and so on.

The Manuscripts.

The sources from which the materials for this edition have been drawn comprise the Manuscripts employed by Dr. Wotton. Together with those used by him, the Wynnstay collection contributed a valuable Manuscript, the splendid Hengwrt collection furnished a large store of materials, and other various unexplored sources afforded much, the particulars of which are enumerated in the following pages. They are distinguished by the letters of the English alphabet, and by four other characters taken from the Saxon alphabet, and the references to them in the body of the Work are regulated accordingly.

The Venedotian or North Wales Code.

- A.* The Manuscript used as the text has been designated by the Letter A. It was adopted for that station on account of its being the most ancient manuscript in the Welsh language which has passed under the Editor's observation. Apart from that consideration, it is not so carefully written as B., and the scribe may have been a monk, and not so skilful in the British tongue as other languages; to this we may ascribe the numerous inaccuracies to be found in it. The orthography also at the period of its transcription was in a very unsettled state, for we find some other person, not far from the commencement, taking up the pen and transcribing a sentence in a very different orthography to that of the general writer of the book; from which it is likely that they both deviated from the original before them, adopting letters at their own pleasure. It is difficult to affix a certain date to this transcript, more particularly as the part which recites amendments to have been made in the laws by Bleddyn ab Cynvyn, about 1080, is unfortunately lost. There can be little doubt, however, that it was contained in it, as E., which has every appearance of being a copy of this Manuscript, has the passage. It may probably have been transcribed in the monastic establishment of Bangor, as it contains laws peculiar to the district of Arvon, or Caernarvonshire, in which Bangor was situated, and alleges the affirmation of them, if impeached, to belong to the communities of Bangor and of Clynog. These local privileges occur in no other Venedotian copies but in this and in E. A. is in the Hengwrt collection, and may be attributed to the early part of the twelfth century. It is endorsed, by Rt. Vaughan, Llyvr du o Waen, the "Black book of Chirk," probably from its being procured from thence; it was transcribed by Wm. Morris, of Llansilin, in 1680. Upon blank spaces in some of the folios of this manuscript an elegy upon Llywelyn ab Jorwerth, the composition of the poet Bleddyn, has been introduced. From the orthography and the appearance of the manuscript it appears to have been inserted coterminously with the occurrence, in 1241.
- B.* This Manuscript was used by Wotton for the basis of his edition of "Leges Wallicæ." He does not appear to have been well acquainted with the collection at Hengwrt, as his mention of the manuscripts there deposited is very slight. This transcript is fairly and accurately written, and upon the whole is perhaps the best existing exemplar of the Venedotian Code. The readings in it have been of great use in correcting the erroneous transcriptions of the scribe who wrote A., and also as being an independent version of the laws from another source. Some pleadings occur in this which are not in A., said, in an appended note to a collated copy of them, to be pleadings in use in South Wales. This Manuscript ranks among the - most ancient now remaining, and appears to have been transcribed about the end of the twelfth, or commencement of the thirteenth century. An autograph of Anian, bishop of St. David's from 1268 to 1293, occurs at the conclusion; and it is probable that that prelate, as his name is of Welsh origin, understood the language, and might use this manuscript when advising upon the revision of the Welsh laws, then about to take place, and the result of which was the promulgation of the Statute of Rothelan. It is designated as Titus D. ii. in the Harleian Collection.

- C.* This Manuscript is extensively quoted by Wotton. It is rather more diffuse in its readings than the two before described. There are evidently parts of two nearly similar manuscripts bound together, and those parts confusedly misplaced. The two fragments appear to be of the same era, and may date about the middle of the thirteenth century, perhaps rather later. The denomination of this volume in the Harleian Collection is Caligula A. iii.
- D.* This singularly fine specimen of caligraphy is perfect. The greater part has been bound in a volume, and the conclusion, which occupies but three leaves, was considered to form part of a work upon chronology, which follows the laws, and is thus unfortunately separated from the context, and now forms part of another volume. The glosses and dilatations are numerous in this Manuscript, and furnish the greater part of the bracketed passages in the text of the Venedotian Code, which afford useful explanatory matter, accessory to the better understanding of the text. This Manuscript has also furnished various more modern matter, which occupies, collated with other manuscripts, various books of the continuation. It is a Manuscript of about the middle of the fourteenth century, and is subscribed by the compiler of the catalogue of the Hengwrt collection, in which it is deposited, Llyvr tég, or the Fair Book, from the beauty of the writing.
- E.* This is also a very elegantly written transcript of the Venedotian Laws. It appears to be a transcript of A., or its prototype, as it is verbatim the same, even to the most glaring inaccuracies, without any attempt at revision; such inaccuracies as would be obvious to any one but a mere copyist, ignorant of the subject, and who had no other authority before him: it is thus deficient in those passages which had escaped the observation of the prior scribe. This Manuscript is complete, with the exception of one leaf near the middle of the book, and has conveniently supplied the text where parts of A. have been lost. The orthography of E. had been adapted to the mode in use at the time, which widely differed from the usage when A. was written; but at the conclusion there occurs what appears to be a fac-simile and literatim extract from the Manuscript copied, which from the style appears to have been of considerable antiquity. E. was at one time the property of a person at Llanvair Talhaiarn in the county of Denbigh; afterwards it was deposited at the Welsh School in London, where it now remains, and was lent to the Editor to use for this occasion. It is apparently a work of the middle of the thirteenth century.
- F.* This Manuscript has furnished a considerable portion of the later materials which follow the more ancient forms of the Welsh laws. It is a fair manuscript, of about the commencement of the fifteenth century. It is in the Hengwrt collection.
- G.* In this volume are bound together parts of five different Manuscripts of various eras. One of them, of about the beginning of the thirteenth century, has furnished a valuable collation to that found in B., of the Cynghaŷedd or Pleadings, forming Book v. Some of the remainder relate to the Venedotian, others to the Dimetian forms of the Laws. These later ones were transcribed about the fifteenth century, and mostly bear either autographs, or some tokens of being found in North Wales. This volume forms part of the Hengwrt collection.

H. Bound up with A. there has been found this transcript of later Welsh laws, much decayed and nearly illegible. Mr. Robert Vaughan having, by the aid of a chemical process, in some degree restored the legibility of the writing, copied whatever he could in any way decipher. As considerable sources of illustration of obscure notices in the Laws are furnished by this compilation, such parts as were not too obscure, from the impossibility of procuring a continuous reading of the text, have been given, with a translation, in Book xiv. Being, unlike the generality of Welsh manuscripts, written on parchment of an inferior quality, and badly preserved, it is so far decayed as not to admit at present of the possibility of any further reference. It is likewise the only existing version of what appears to have been intended by the compiler as illustrations of Welsh laws and customs digested into the form of triads. I should attribute it to the sixteenth century.

The Dimetian or West Wales Code.

- I.* A small octavo transcript in the Hengwrt collection, of about the fourteenth century, marked Beta 19. The versions of the Venedotian class being designated by Alpha, those of the Dimetian form are classed under Beta, in a Schedule of the Hengwrt collection; their incompatibility occasioned this distinction.
- J.* A fair written Manuscript, in Jesus College Library, Oxford. It contains voluminous transcripts of parts of the later forms of each of the different Codes. A manuscript of the fifteenth century.
- K.* A Manuscript in the Hengwrt collection. It contains an exemplar of the Laws at a late period. Among some forms of pleadings one is dated the 8th of Edw. IV., and the Manuscript being uniformly written, and in a hand of that period, it is probable that the transcription was made about 1469. Marked Kalan. in the Hengwrt catalogue, from the circumstance of a calendar being prefixed to the matter.
- L.* A Manuscript in the British Museum, designated Titus D. ix. As this forms the most ancient and complete exemplar of the Dimetian form it has been adopted as the text of that Code. The peculiarities of the Dimetian dialect also are conspicuously apparent in it. The variations in the Manuscripts of this class are but few, and they perhaps exhibit the nearest affinity to the original compilation sanctioned by Howel. It appears to have been written about the close of the thirteenth or early part of the fourteenth century.
- M.* A Manuscript in the Hengwrt collection, of about the close of the fourteenth century. Marked Beta 47.
- N.* A Manuscript in the Hengwrt Library, of the fourteenth century. Designated as Beta, and bound up with
- O.* Another Manuscript in that collection, of about the same age. This is marked Bedu.
- P.* A Manuscript in the Hengwrt collection, of about the commencement of the fifteenth century. It is there designated as Be-fol, as being of a folio form.
- Q.* A beautifully executed transcript, in the Wynnstay Library. It contains much additional later matter which has been incorporated in the body of Welsh laws. Among the forms of pleadings contained in it the date 2d of Henry IV. is introduced, and the appearance of the orthography and style would induce the supposition that it was transcribed about 1401.
- R.* A Manuscript in the Hengwrt collection, of about the middle of the fourteenth century. On account of having been in the possession of one Maredudd Llwyd, it is designated by his name in the catalogue.
- S.* A Manuscript in the Library of the Cymrodorion Society in London. It is of about the fifteenth century, and was evidently written in Cardiganshire, from its invocations of Dewi and Gwenog, the saints of the churches of Llanddewi brevi and Llanwenog in that county, frequently appended to sentences. Much matter, not elsewhere to be found, has been collected from this volume.

- T. A Manuscript in the Harleian collection, 958, of about the close of the thirteenth century.

The Gwentian Code.

- U. A Manuscript in the Hengwrt collection of about the middle of the fourteenth century. It is in the catalogue styled Morg., from a passage in it which recites that this law is copied from the form that Cynverth and his son Morgeneu compiled. It has been adopted as the text of the class of Gwentian forms, not from any superiority, but as being the simplest; most of the others being anomalous, and containing much matter extracted from the Dimetian form.
- V. A Manuscript in the Harleian collection of the British Museum, 4353, written in the Dimetian dialect, about the commencement of the fourteenth century.
- W. A Manuscript in the British Museum, in the Cottonian Library, Cleopatra A. xiv., written about the middle of the fourteenth century.
- X. Another Manuscript in the same depository, Cleopatra B. v., of about the same age as the last.
- Y. A Manuscript presented by the Rev. Mr. Conybeare to the Literary Society of Neath, by whom the use of it for this work was kindly afforded to the Editor. It may be attributed to the middle of the fourteenth century.
- Z. A Manuscript in the Hengwrt collection, styled Pomf., from the circumstance of its being presented by the Constable of Pomfret Castle to one Einion ab Adda, as detailed in a note inserted in a vacant space. This transcript was apparently made in the year 1480, from a date occurring incidentally in the matter. This is the only Manuscript written upon paper, all the rest being transcribed on vellum or parchment.

The Welsh or Anomalous Laws.

- Æ. A Manuscript in the Hengwrt collection, in the catalogue styled As., from the circumstance of a memorandum to this effect, "D. Gulielmi Asaphani ex dono Tho. Gulielmi nunc D. Rob. Vachani de Hengwrt test. Guilh. Mauricio Lansiliensis, per quem transcriptus est fideliter, Ann° 1662." The date of the transcript, if to be inferred from an incidental entry in the matter, would be 1429; and the style of the handwriting would agree with that date.
- E. The designation of collations from a Manuscript formerly in the Sebright collection, in Wotton's schedule styled S. 3.
- ∞. A fragment of a Manuscript in the Hengwrt collection, styled, from that circumstance, in the catalogue, Frag. It is bound together with N. and O., and agrees nearly verbatim with Æ.
- Ð. Designates excerpts from the Llyvr gwyn Hergest, or White Book of Hergest (near Kington, Herefordshire).

Leges Wallicæ.

1st. (p. 771.) A Manuscript in the Hengwrt collection, of about the early part of the thirteenth century, in the Schedule known as Lat.

2d. (p. 808.) A Manuscript in the Cottonian collection, in the British Museum, known as Vespasian E. xi. It is of about the early part of the fourteenth century.

3d. (p. 854.) An imperfect Manuscript, in the Harleian collection, and numbered 1796. It may be ascribed to the thirteenth century.

There is a Manuscript in the Bodleian Library at Oxford, marked 280. It is of the Dimetian form, and written about the fourteenth century.¹ There is nothing particular in it, with the exception of the preface, which contains the verses to be found in the Welsh prefaces to the later forms of the Dimetian Code. As these verses somewhat differ from those there given, the preface is here subjoined:—

“Dei prouidencia Howel da filius Cadell, rex tocius Kambriæ, uidens suos Walenses insolenter legibus abuti, acciuit de quolibet kemut tocius regni sui sex laicos uiros auctoritate et scientia pollentes, et omnes ecclesiasticos dignitate baculosos, ut archiepiscopus uel episcopus uel abbas uel prior, de regno suo ad locum qui dicitur Tŷ Gŷn super Taff yn Deued, quam domum uoluit ædificari uirgis albis in hospicium, ã ad uenandum, quando ad partes Demecie ueniret, et ideo uocabatur Tŷ Gŷn. Rex autem et congregati morati sunt ibidem per totam quadragesimam, orantes Altissimum per jejunium perfectum, petendo gratiam ad bona facienda secundum regis propositum, et de congregatis elegit rex xii. laicos doctissimos et vnum clericum doctissimum qui uocabatur Blaugoridus, ad instruendum sibi leges et vsus, ut propinqui possent ad ueritatem et iusticiam intendi; et in tres partes scribi præcepit, quarum prima lex curiæ suæ cotidianæ, secunda lex patriæ, tertia usus utriusque. Tres ã libros legis præcepit fieri consimiles, vnum ad curiam suam cotidianam secum semper, et alium ad curiam de Dineuwr, et tertium ad curiam de Aberffraû, ut quælibet de tribus partibus Kambriæ, scilicet, Gwenet, et Powys, et Deheubarth, haberent in se auctoritatem legum ad opus paratam. Quorum consilio et diligenti examinacione leges antiquas partim appropriauit, partim emendauit, partim ex toto deleuit, alias de nouo condidit. Prouulgatis itaque legibus quas obseruari decreuerat, auctoritatem suam cis impartiuit, firmiterque et illibate eas teneri imperauit. Ipse uero et omnes qui cum eo erant maledictionem Dī et suam et tocius Walliæ impetrati sunt ei qui eas in Wallia deinceps non obseruando temeraret.

“Explicit edictus legibus, liber bñfictus,
 Quem regi scripsit Blaugoridus, et quoque fiŷ,

Gornerth Iŷyd mab Gŷyberi bach [Gornandus canus, filius Gwiberi parui,] erat iudex curiæ de Dinewur in tempore Hŷwel da, ut Pdiū est in uersibus.”

There is also a Latin transcript in Merton College Library, Oxford, one in Trinity College Library, Cambridge, and another in the archiepiscopal collection at Lambeth, but they do not materially differ from the Manuscripts here printed, and are all of the Dimetian class. It has consequently been considered unnecessary to afford them a place in this Edition. A few additional Welsh transcripts and fragments of laws are to be found in the Hengwrt collection, but of little importance, and requiring no further notice.

Statuta de Rothelan.

This Statute has been supplied from the collated edition so ably edited by Sir Henry Ellis. Some few various readings have been adopted from other sources.

The operose task of collating the various matters contained in these Manuscripts and distributing them in their respective classes having been gone through, the enquirer may now ascertain the reading of every existing Manuscript of each description, with the exception of some fragments of no importance, and may also estimate the form and character of each version, and scrutinize the validity of the conclusions that induced the classifications here adopted, which required no transpositions of matter, nor occasioned any incongruity of arrangement. The labour incurred in the collation, and in the care required in the printing and correction of such complicated matter, were the causes of a longer delay in the publication than could have been anticipated, and which the Editor greatly regrets.

THE facilities which have been afforded me in the prosecution of this Work demand my especial acknowledgments.

Colonel VAUGHAN, the possessor of the magnificent collection of Welsh Manuscripts at Hengwrt, with that courtesy for which he is distinguished, permitted me, in the kindest manner, unreserved access at all times to that source of important materials for this edition.

Sir W. W. WYNNÉ opened to me the fine stores of his libraries at Wynnstay and Llanvorda.

The invaluable exertions of the Honorable C. W. WYNNÉ in furthering the proceedings regarding the Principality, have greatly contributed to embodying in the previous works and this Volume all existing remains relating to early Welsh historical notices and ancient laws.

My obligations to HENRY PETRIE, Esquire, are of the deepest description; to his judicious observations the Work is indebted for a degree of order and uniformity which I am fearful would otherwise have been deficient, and for observations which caused minuter inquiries, and the avoidance thereby of many errors which I should now be constrained to lament.

TO JOHN ALLEN, Esquire, my acknowledgments are due for the urbane assistance which his love of literature, station, and influence enabled him to afford.

C. P. COOPER, Esquire, Secretary to the Commission, by his exertions, where obstacles arose, obviated many difficulties; and the congenial interest he always evinced in the progress of this Work materially advanced its completion.

Many kind friends will perceive that their suggestions have been attended to.

The mechanical execution of a work of such complexity as the basis on which this has been conducted would have rendered it nearly hopeless for me to have encountered it, unassisted by the practised acumen of the various departments in Her Majesty's Printing Office. Their vigilant superintendance was a provident relief to much anxiety, and a guarantee that but few literal errors would occur.

1st May 1841.

[PREFACE.]

HOWEL the good, the son of Cadell, prince of all ¹'Cymru,' seeing the ²'Cymry' perverting the laws, summoned to him six men, from each ³'cymwd' in the principality, ⁴'the wisest in his dominion, to the ⁵'White House on the Tav;' four of them laics, and two clerks. The clerks were summoned lest the laics should ordain any thing contrary to the holy scripture. The time when they assembled together was Lent, and the reason they assembled in Lent was, because every one should be pure at that holy time, and should do no wrong at a time of purity. And with mutual counsel and deliberation the wise men there assembled examined the ancient laws; some of which they suffered to continue unaltered, some they amended, others they entirely abrogated; and some new laws they enacted.

And after promulgating the laws which they had decided to establish, Howel sanctioned them with his authority, and strictly commanded them to be scrupulously observed. And Howel and the wise men who were with him denounced their malediction, and that of all the Cymry, upon him who should not obey the laws: and they de-

4. Three times in the year the above twenty-four officers are entitled to receive, according to law, their woollen garments from the king, and their linen garments from the queen; namely, at Christmas, Easter, and Whitsuntide.

5. The king is to give the queen a third of the produce of his landed property; and in like manner the servants of the king are to give a third to the servants of the queen.

II. [OF THE KING.]

1. The 'worth' of the king is his ^b'saraad' three-fold.

2. In three ways saraad is done to the king: one is, by the violation of his protection, when he shall give protection to any one and he is killed: another is, when two kings meet together upon their common boundary for a conference, and, in the presence of the two kings, and of the two hosts, a man belonging to the one kills a man belonging to the other: the third is, the seduction of his wife; the saraad for which shall be augmented by a half.

3. The saraad of the king of Aberfraw is to be paid thus: an hundred cows for each ^d'cantrev' in his dominion, ²⁹and a white bull with red ears to every hundred cows; and a rod of gold equal in length to himself, and as thick as his little finger; and a plate of gold as broad as his face, and as thick as the nail of a ploughman who has been a ploughman for ^bseven years. Gold is paid only to the king of Aberfraw.

III. [OF THE QUEEN.]

1. In three ways saraad is done to the queen: one is, by violating the protection which she may give; another is, by striking her ³⁹with any thing; the third is, by snatching any thing out of her hand: and the saraad paid to her is one third of the saraad of the king; and that without gold and without silver.

IV. [OF THE KING'S RETINUE.]

1. The king is to have thirty-six horsemen in attendance; that is, the twenty-four officers, and the twelve ^a'gwestai,' besides his household, and his ^b'gwyrda,' his servants, his minstrels, and his almsmen; and these are called the king's train.

V. [OF THE EDLING.]

1. The heir apparent, that is, the 'edling,' is he who is to reign after the king; and he is to be the most honourable ¹³in the palace' after the king and queen.

2. He ought to be son or nephew to the king.

3. His seat in the palace is between the ⁴⁴'osb' and the chief falconer; the sixth man at mess with the king.

4. His lodging is in the hall; and the ⁴⁵'youths' along with him; and the woodman, to light the fire, and to shut the doors.

5. His allowance of meat and drink is without measure; and all his expenditure is to be defrayed from the king's coffers; as, for his ⁴⁶'bridle and his horses, his dogs, his rings, and his ornaments; his arms likewise are supplied by the king; but he is not to part with any of these, without the permission of the king. When the edling dies, he is to leave his horses and his dogs to the king, for that is the only ⁴⁷'ebediw' he is to render: and the reason why he ought to render no other, is, because he is a near relation of the king. The king's near relations are his sons, his nephews, and his first cousins. Some say that every one of these is an edling; others say, that no one is an edling, except that person to whom the king shall give hope of succession and designation.

6. He is the third person who is to preside at the banquet in the palace; and the servants are to wait upon him as though in presence of the king.

7. He is not to go away from the king for a single night, ⁴⁸if it be his will.

8. The worth of the edling is a third of the worth of the king.

9. His saraad is a third of the saraad of the king, without gold.

11. The provender of his horse is without measure. His dogs are of the same worth as the dogs of the king.

12. The edling, and those whom we have above mentioned, shall possess that privilege until they obtain land: after ¹that, their privilege shall be identified with the privilege of the land they obtain, except they obtain land in villenage; in that case the privilege of the land shall augment until it become free.

13. ¹⁷No person has a claim upon him, ¹⁸at the three principal festivals, ¹⁹for his clothes: they are to be disposed of in such manner as the king may please. ²⁰No servant has a claim upon him for service; for he is to be served gratuitously.

VI. [OF APPROPRIATE PLACES.]

1. There are fourteen persons who sit on chairs in the palace; four of them in the lower portion, and ten in the upper portion. The first is the king; he is to sit next the ¹“screen”: next to him the ²“canghellor;” then the oob; then the edling; then the chief falconer; the foot-holder on the side opposite to the king's dish; and the ³“mediciner, at the base of the pillar opposite to him, on the other side of the fire. Next to the other screen, the priest of the household, to bless the food and chaunt the ⁴“Pater;” the silentary is to strike the pillar above his head: next to him the judge of the court; next to him the chaired bard; the smith of the court on the end of the bench, before the priest. The chief of the household is to sit at the lower end of the hall, with his left hand to the front door; and those he may choose of the household with him; and the rest on the other side of the door. The bard of the household is to sit on one hand of the chief of the household; the chief groom next to the king, separated by the screen; and the chief huntsman next to the priest of the household, separated by the screen.

² The hall, it would appear, contained six pillars for the support of the roof; the fire-place occupied a space between two of these pillars, and screens, which extended from these pillars to the side walls, divided the hall into two parts; in the dais, or upper portion, the king and nine of his officers were seated, in the nether portion were allotted seats for the other four officers, and places for the rest of the household.

VII. [OF THE CHIEF OF THE HOUSEHOLD.]

1. The chief of the household is to be a son of the king, or his nephew, or one of rank competent to become a chief of the household. An ⁴⁶uchelwr' cannot become a chief of the household; and the reason why he cannot is, because the privilege of the chief of the household is identified with that of the king, ⁴⁷which is not the case with an uchelwr.' On that account the men of 'Gwynedd' take away the chief of the household from the number of the twenty-four officers below the steward.

2. His worth is one-third of that of the king.

3. His saraad is one-third of the saraad of the king, excepting the gold.

4. His protection is, to convey an offender to a place of security.

5. His seat in the palace is with his left hand to the door of the hall.

6. He is to place the harp in the hands of the bard of the household on the three principal festivals.

7. His lodging is, the largest and more central house in the town, and with him such as he may please of the household; the rest around his lodging, ⁴⁸so as to be at hand' to minister to his service.

8. He is to have the second most honourable mess in the palace; and that next after the king.

9. His allowance is three messes and three hornfuls of the best liquor that may be in the palace.

10. If any act be done below the ⁴⁹entrance for which a ⁵⁰'dirwy' is paid, he claims a third of it. And if any person commit an offence above the entrance, and shall be seized in his flight by himself, or by any of the household, the chief of the household is to have ⁵¹a third of his dirwy.

11. He is to have the garment of the king at the three principal festivals; and his horses at all times, and his dogs, his hawks, and his arms; and his dogs and his hawks

⁵²and no uchelwr is to rank higher than another.

⁵⁷ The word 'clochydd,' literally, 'bellman,' at present denotes a parish clerk: it is here rendered 'chaplain,' because two ancient Latin mss. have 'domus capel-

mas, himself and the household. The household is to consist of three parties: the elder party, the middle party, and the younger party; and alternately he is to be with each: and the party he is with is to choose its house. And so long as he shall be on that progress he is to have servants, a door-ward, and a cook, and 'servants of the table. And these are to have the skins of the animals which are slaughtered; and the cooks are to have the tallow, the fragments, and the entrails. After that progress is finished, he is to return to the king, and remain with him to the end of the year; and he is not to leave him except upon his service: and the reason is this, because the household is the third indispensable about the king: the other two are the priest of the household, and the judge of the court.

23. When the chief of the household shall die, the king is to have his horse, his arms, his dogs, and his hawk; and these are in lieu of his ebediw; for no ebediw is payable from a near relation of the king except his 'harness.

VIII. [OF THE PRIEST OF THE HOUSEHOLD.]

1. The second is the priest of the household.

2. He is to have his land free; his clothing three times in the year; and his horse in attendance; and his linen clothing from the queen, and his woollen clothing from the king.

3. His place in the hall is opposite to the king, on the opposite side of the fire, next to the screen, to say grace, and to chaunt the 'Pater.'

4. His lodging is in the house of the 'chaplain, and the clerks with him.

5. His saraad is according to the decision of the synod.

6. His allowance is a mess of meat, with a hornful of liquor.

7. He is entitled to an offering from the king, and from every one to whom the king shall give an offering at the three principal festivals.

8. He is to have a third of the king's tithe.

9. He is to have the tithe of the household, and he is entitled to their 'daered.'

12. He is to have the dress worn by the king during Lent.

13. He is to be constantly with the king, for he is the third indispensable person.

14. He is to have a fresh horse, when necessary, from the king.

15. The bishop is not to present any one to the king's chapels, without the permission of the priest of the household, ⁴except by the advice of the king.

IX. [OF THE STEWARD.]

1. The third is the steward.

2. He is to have his land free ; his horse in attendance ; and his clothing three times in the year, like the rest ; that is, his woollen clothing from the king, and his linen clothing from the queen.

3. His place in the palace is that of the fourth man from the king, at mess with him.

4. His lodging is the king's barn, lest smoke should affect his birds.

5. He is to bring a vessel to the palace, to hold his liquor; for he ought only to quench his thirst ⁶¹while in the palace, lest his birds should be injured by neglect.

6. He is to have a hand-breadth of wax candle from the steward, feeding his birds and making his bed.

7. He is not to pay silver to the chief groom, for the king serves him on three occasions, when he flies his hawk, by holding his horse: the time he is to hold his horse is, when he alights, and when he mounts to hold the stirrup; and to hold his horse while he performs his necessary duty.

8. He is to have the hearts and lungs of the ²wild animals killed in the kitchen, to feed his hawks.

9. He is to have a crone, or four pence, from the king's villains. Once a year he is to have a progress among the villains.

10. He is to have a third of the dirwy of the falconers, and the ³'amobyr' of their daughters.

11. He is to have the skin of a hart in autumn, and the skin of a hind in the spring, to make gloves for bearing his hawks, and for making jesses.

12. He is to be honoured with three presents the day his hawk shall kill one of the three birds; a bittern, a heron, or a crane.

13. He is to have the mantle in which the king shall ride, at the three principal festivals.

14. His protection is, unto the queen. Others say, that it is unto the farthest place where he shall fly his hawk at a bird.

15. He is to have the male hawks, and the nests of the falcons and of the sparrow-hawks, that are on the king's demesne.

16. From the time he shall place his hawk in the mew until he shall take it out, he is not to answer any claim, except it be to one of his fellow officers.

17. His saraad is six kine, and six score of silver, subject to augmentation.

XII. [OF THE CHIEF GROOM.]

1. The sixth is the chief groom.

2. He is to have his land free; and his linen clothing from the queen, and his woollen clothing from the king; and his horse in attendance.

3. His seat is on the other side of the screen, next to the king.

4. His lodging is the house nearest to the barn, as his duty is to distribute the provender.

5. He is to have two shares of provender for his horse.

6. He is to have four pence for every horse which the king may give, except from three persons; these are, the bishop, the chief falconer, and the jester. The reason he receives nothing from the bishop is, because he is the king's confessor, to whom the king is to rise and to sit down after him, and to hold his sleeves whilst he shall wash himself: the reason he receives nothing from the chief falconer is, because the king is to serve him on three privileged occasions: the reason he receives nothing from the jester is, because he is to tie the halter, which is on the horse's head given to him, around his testicles, as he goes from the palace: for these reasons they are not to pay the grooms silver.

7. He and the other grooms are to have the ³⁰wild colts, up to two years old, from the king's third of the spoil.

8. He is entitled to the king's rain-caps, his old saddles of unpainted wood, his old cast-off bridles, and his old cast-off spurs.

9. He is to carry the arms of the king.

10. He is to have an ³⁵ox hide in winter, and a cow hide in summer, ³⁶from the steward, to make halters.

11. No one is to have any of the lees, but the chief groom is to have a hand-breadth between liquor and lees.

12. ³⁸Skins to make halters.

13. He is to have the legs of the cattle slaughtered in the kitchen.

14. His protection is, during a course of the swiftest horse ⁴¹at the court' ⁴²of the king.

2. He is to have his land free; and his horse in attendance; and his linen clothing from the queen, and his woollen clothing from the king.

3. He is to sit next the chief of the household, at the three principal festivals, who is to place the harp in his hand.

4. He is to have the clothes of the steward, at the three principal festivals.

5. When a song is desired, the chaired bard is to begin; the first song of God, and the second of the king who shall own the palace; or, if there be none, let him sing of another king. After the chaired bard, the bard of the household is to sing three songs, on various subjects.

6. If the queen desire a song, let the bard of the household go to sing to her without limitation, in a low voice, so that the hall may not be disturbed by him.

7. He is to have a cow, or an ox, from the booty obtained by the household from a border-country, after a third has gone to the king: and he is, when they share the spoil, to sing the 'Monarchy of Britain' to them.

8. He is to have a throw-board, of the bone of a sea-animal, from the king, and a ³⁰gold ring from the queen.

9. His lodging is with the chief of the household.

10. His protection is, to convey an offender to the chief of the household. ³⁵Others say, it is from the first song to the last.'

11. When he shall go with other bards, he is to have the share of two.

12. His sarnad is six kine, and six score of silver.

13. His worth is six score and six kine, ³⁶to be augmented' ³⁹once.

xv. OF THE SILENTIARY, HIS OFFICE, HIS PRIVILEGE, AND HIS DUTY, THIS TREATS.

1. The ninth is the silentiary.

2. He is to have his land free; and his horse in attendance; and his linen clothing from the queen, and his woollen clothing from the king.

3. He is to have the share of one man from the servants.

4. He is to have four pence for every cow which comes as a dirwy from any one pertaining to the palace.

5. He is to superintend the meat and drink, under the steward.

its worth is a pound. And from that time to the feast of St. John at midsummer he is to hunt the hinds; and during that time he is not to answer any one in any claim upon him, unless it be one of his fellow officers: and some say that he is only to swear by his horn and his leashes.

9. He is to have the skin of an ox, in winter, to make leashes; and the skin of a cow, in summer, to make boots.

10. On the morrow after the feast of St. John, at midsummer, he is to go to hunt stags: and unless he be taken before he has risen from his bed and put on his boots, he is not obliged to answer any one who may have a claim upon him. From that time to the calends of winter there are twelve lawful pieces in the harts; and for that reason they are to be hunted until the calends of winter. And the ninth day of the calends of winter he ought to go to hunt wild swine; and from that time he is to hunt them until the calends of November: and during that time he is not to answer any one's claim, unless it be to one of his fellow officers, and that to the calends of the month of November, when the wild swine are hunted, if he be cited before he puts on his boots.

11. And on the calends of November he is to share the skins, and pay all his fellow officers who have a right to a share: and then answer. And after that, the skins are to be divided into two portions and a third; the two portions to the huntsmen, and the third to the king. Of the two portions of the huntsmen, the huntsmen with the covert hounds are to have two shares, and the huntsmen with the greyhounds one share. And the chief huntsman is to have two shares of the skins from the huntsmen with the covert hounds, and two shares from the huntsmen with the greyhounds. And from the king's third of the skins he is to have a third: and he is the third man who shares in the king's third. After all this is completed, the chief huntsman is to show the

XVIII. OF THE MEDICINER OF THE HOUSEHOLD, HIS OFFICE, HIS PRIVILEGE, AND HIS DUTY, THIS TREATS.

1. The twelfth is the mediciner of the household.

2. He is to have his land free; his horse in attendance; and his linen clothing from the queen, and his woollen clothing from the king.

3. His seat in the hall within the palace is at the base of the pillar to which the screen is attached, near which the king sits.

4. His lodging is with the chief of the household.

5. His protection is, from the time the king shall command him to visit a wounded or sick person, whether the person be in the palace or out of it, until he quit him, to convey away an offender.

6. He is to administer medicine gratuitously to all within the palace, and to the 'chief of the household;' and he is to have nothing from them except their bloody clothes, unless it be for one of the three dangerous wounds, as mentioned before; these are, a stroke on the head unto the brain, a stroke in the body unto the bowels, and the breaking of one of the four limbs. For every one of these three dangerous wounds the mediciner is to have nine score pence and his food, or one pound without his food, and also the bloody clothes.

7. The mediciner is to have, when he shall apply a tent, twenty-four pence.

8. For an application of red ointment, ⁵⁶twelve pence.

9. For an application of herbs to a swelling, four legal pence.

10. For letting blood, four pence.

11. His food daily is worth one penny halfpenny.

12. His light every night is worth one legal penny.

13. The worth of a medical pan is one penny.

14. The mediciner is to take an indemnification from the kindred of the wounded person, in case he die from the remedy he may use: and if he do not take it, let him answer for the deed.

15. He is to accompany the armies.

16. He is never to leave the palace, but with the king's permission.

5. He is to drink with the servants, and he is not to sit while the king shall be eating and drinking in the hall ; and he is not to strike the pillar on the side where the king shall be.

6. Of the vessels used in serving, he is to have the fill of ale, and the half of bragot, and the third of mead.

7. And he is to have the legs of the oxen and kine obtained by his information, to make boots to the height of his ankles ; and on the ninth day of the calends of winter, he shall have a coat, a shirt, and trousers without " tenlliv." His clothes are to reach to the knot of his trousers. On the calends of winter, he is to have a cap ; and a mantle on the calends of March, or February.

8. The apparitor is to divide between the king and the canghellor.

9. He is to have from a house in which a death has taken place, the meat in cut, the butter in cut, the lowest stone of the quern, the "green flax, the lowest layer of corn, the hens, the cats, the ²³fuel axe, and the headland of corn uncut in the field, or the skirts if there be no headland.

10. From every house to which he goes on the business of the king, he is to have a loaf and its " enllyn."

11. Three cubits are to be the length of his spear ; two behind him, and one before him.

12. Of the booty obtained out of the country, he is to have a bull, or an animal that has not been under the yoke, or a milch heifer.

13. When the apparitor dies, the king is to have all his goods.

14. If the apparitor be sitting, and is insulted whilst causes are trying, he is to have no other compensation than a sieve of oats and an egg shell.

15. His saraad, ⁵¹in every case, according to some, is equal to the saraad payable to the person upon whose land he may be insulted. And in like manner his " galanas." Others say his saraad is "three kine, and three score of silver."

1. The cleventh is the laundress.

2. She is to have her food from the palace ; a mess, when the king is present ; and her clothes : and she is to have, on the day she shall wash for the queen, a gift from her.

3. Her protection is, as far as she can throw her washing beetle.

4. 'Her saraad, and her worth are as those of the baking-woman.'

Above we have treated of the officers pertaining to the court, both legal and customary ; and their privilege and their duty.

' ³¹His saraad, and his worth are the same as those of the smith of the court.

' ³²Her saraad is a third of the saraad of her husband ; and if she be not married, half of the saraad of her brother : and so of every married woman.

XLIII. HERE WE TREAT 'OF OTHER THINGS.'

1. The three indispensables to a king are, his priest to say grace and sing mass; the judge of the court, to elucidate every thing doubtful; and his household for his commands.

2. The three indispensables to a ^a'gwrda'; his harp, his cloak, and his cauldron.

3. The three indispensables to a ^b'taeog'; his ¹¹feet trough, his augre, and his backfire-stone.

4. Three things which the king is not to share with any person; his treasure, his hawk, and his thief.

5. The three 'nets' of the king; ¹⁷the pasture of' his horses, his herd of swine, and his herd of cattle: if a person lose an animal, and it be found among the animals of the king, he is to have four pence for every one so found.

6. The three nets of a gwrda; his horses, his herd of cattle, and his herd of swine:
if a person find an animal among them, let him pay four pence.

7. The three nets of a taeog; his herd of swine, his herd of cattle, and his ^bsummer-house, from the calends of May unto August:
if he find an animal astray, among them,
he is to have four pence reward for discovery; ³²for by law the tenth of the thing discovered is the reward for discovery.'

8. The king has three horns of assemblage, which are to be of buffalo horn, and of equal worth: the horn the king drinks out of, his horn of assembling, and the horn of the chief huntsman; the worth of each of them is one pound.

9. There are three legal harps: the king's harp, the harp of a chief of song, and the harp of a gwrda; the worth of the first two, each six score pence, and their tuning keys twenty-four pence; the harp of a gwrda is worth three score pence, and the tuning key twelve pence.

10. Three things which a taeog is not to sell, without the permission of his lord: a stallion, honey, and swine; and, if he should sell them, let him be subject to dirwy, and the bargain be void; and, if his lord do not purchase them, he may sell them in whatever way he may please.

11. Three arts which the son of a taeog is not to learn, without the permission of his lord; and, if he should learn them, he must not exercise them, except a scholar, after he has taken holy orders: these are, scholarship, smithcraft, and bardism.

12. The eight 'packhorses' of the king: the sea, a waste, an indigent person from another country, a thief, a person dying suddenly, a childless person, a death whereby he obtains an ebediw, a criminal from whom he obtains a dirwy or a camlwrw.

13. Whoever shall use rude language to the king; let him pay a double camlwrw to the king.

14. Wherever the priest of the household, the steward, and the judge of the court meet together; that place has the privilege of the court.

15. The king is not to go with his host out of the country, except once a year: but they are to attend the king in his own dominions whenever he shall please. The king is to have, from every 'villain-trev,' a man, a horse, and an axe to form encampments, at his own cost.

16. Nine buildings which the villains of the king are to erect for him: a hall, a chamber, a buttery, a stable, a dog-house, a barn, a kiln, a privy, and a dormitory.

17. All chattels without an owner are the king's waste.

18. Three things which the king is not to share with another, if obtained by spoil in another country: gold and silver treasure, buffalo horns, and a dress which has a gold border to it.

19. A double camlwrw is to be in the palace and in the church, and so a dirwy.

20. Whoever shall do a wrong in a mother church, let him pay to it fourteen pounds: one half to the abbot, if he be a divinity scholar; and the other half between the 'priest and the community. If a wrong be committed in a church-yard, seven pounds; to be divided in two halves like the other.

21. Whoever shall do a wrong in another church, let him pay seven pounds: the one half to the 'priest, and the other to the 'parson.

12. If by dying and living they separate, let the sick, aided by the confessor, share, and let the healthy choose.

13. The sick is not to bequeath aught, except a daered to the church, and ¹³an ebediw to' the lord, and his debts: and, should he bequeath, the son can break the bequest; and such a one is called the uncourteous son. Whoever therefore shall break a legal bequest, whether daered or debts, shall be excommunicated, ²¹as a publican or pagan.'

14. If living they separate, let her and her property remain in the house to the end of nine days and nine nights, to ascertain whether the separation be legal; and if the separation be right, at the end of the ninth day, let her property go before, and, after the last penny, let her go herself.

15. The saraad of a married woman is according to the privilege of the husband; ³³that is, a third of her husband's saraad: before she is betrothed to a man, it is according to the privilege of her brother's saraad; that is, half the saraad of her brother.

28. Whoever shall give a woman to a man, must pay her amobyr, or take sureties from her for its payment: but if she dispose of herself, let her pay her amobyr herself; because she has been her own disposer.

29. If a man take away a woman clandestinely, and bring her to the house of an uchelwr, to sleep with her, and the gwrda do not take security for her amobyr, let him pay it himself.

30. If a man take a woman clandestinely, let her be, until the end of the seventh year, upon three steers whose horn and ear are of equal length; and since she herself lost her own privilege, let her be on that privilege to the end of the seventh year: and if she have argyvreu, let that remain entire unto the end of the seventh year; if she permit it to be made use of, no compensation shall be made to her for what is consumed for food and clothes. ³¹From the end of the seventh year, if she reach within three nights ³²of the 'seventh year,' a sharing is to be made with her in halves, as a betrothed wife: because a wife, whether abducted, or betrothed, continues on the privilege of her agweddi only unto the end of the seventh year; and she is not subject to agweddi after the expiration of the seven years; therefore let them share in halves.

31. Whoever shall sleep three nights with a woman, from the time the fire is covered until it be uncovered the following morning, and after that willeth to separate; let him give her an ox that shall be worth twenty pence, another worth thirty pence, and another worth 'sixty pence; and, if he take her to house and home, and she live with him unto the end of seven years; thenceforwards he is to share with her, as with a betrothed wife.

maintain the child; for the law enacts that ⁶⁶she ought not to suffer loss on account of the man, since she received no benefit from him, and therefore he is to rear the child.

34. If a man part from his wife, and she be pregnant at the time of separation, let her be allowed, from that period unto the time of parturition, what would suffice to rear the babe for half a year; and after the child is born, she is to rear it unto the end of the year; willing or unwilling, she is to rear it, for an allowance from the husband. The measure of the allowance is, a milch cow, a coat worth four pence, a pan worth a penny, and a car load of the best corn that shall grow upon his patrimony; and these unto the end of the year towards rearing the child. And she herself must afterwards rear it for half a year; and thenceforward she cannot be compelled to rear it beyond her own proportion, unless it be her will; and from thence unto the end of the fourteenth year, two thirds of the rearing fall on the father, and one third on the mother; and, at the expiration of the fourteen years, it is right for the father to take him to his lord, to become a man to him: and from that time forward he is to be supported by his lord.

38. If a man take away a maid clandestinely, her lord and her kindred are to take her away from him, though it may annoy him : and, if she had previously been with another man, she cannot after that be taken from the man who took her clandestinely, unless it be her will.

39. The three peculiars of a woman : her cowyll, her ¹gowyn, and her saraad : the reason these three are called three peculiars is, because they are the three proprieties of a woman, and cannot be taken from her for any cause : her cowyll is what she receives for her maidenhood ; her saraad is, for every beating given to her by her husband, except for three things ; and those three, for which she may be beaten, are, for giving any thing which she ought not to give ; for being detected with another man ²in a covert ; and for wishing drivel upon his beard ; and, if for being found with another man he chaatise her, he is not to have any satisfaction besides that ; for there ought not to be both satisfaction and vengeance for the same crime ; her gowyn is, if she detect her husband with another woman, let him pay her six score pence for the first offence, for the second one pound ; if she detect him a third time, she can separate from him, without losing any thing that belongs to her : and the property she may obtain for the above three things is to be apart from her husband ; ³and, if she endure, without separation, after the third offence, she is not entitled to any satisfaction. The wife of the king may give, without the king's permission, the third of what shall come ⁴of ⁵'dovod' to the king. 53. If a female alltud, in passing through a country, die; let sixteen pence be paid to the proprietor of the soil for her death clod.

54. If a man willeth to separate from his wife, and after he shall have separated, willeth another wife; the first, ¹⁰that has been divorced, is free: for no man is to have two wives.

55. Every woman is to go the way she willeth, freely, for she is not 'to be' revenant; and nothing is due from her, except her amobyr, and only one amobyr; for a woman owes no ebediw, only her amobyr; therefore, as a man is to pay only one ebediw, in like manner, a woman is to pay only one amobyr; for there is no ebediw from her, only her amobyr.

56. A woman cannot be admitted as surety, or witness concerning a man.

² Who is stated to have married Eurgain the daughter of Maelgwn. Maelgwn died about the year 547; and it is conjectured this expedition was undertaken with the view of asserting the claim of Elidyr to the sovereignty of Gwynedd; Run, son of Maelgwn, according to some genealogies, being illegitimate.

³ Lord of a district about the present Edinburgh.

II. [THE PRIVILEGES OF ARVON.]

1. Here ¹Elidyr the courteous, a man from the North, was slain, and after his death the men of the North came here to avenge him. The chiefs, their leaders, were ²Clydno Eiddin; Nudd the generous, son of Senyllt; Mordav the generous, son of Seruari; and ³Rydderch the generous, son of Tudwal Tudglyd; and they came to Arvon: and because Elidyr was slain at ⁴Aber Mewydus in Arvon, they burned Arvon as a further revenge. And then Run, son of Maelgwn, and the men of Gwynedd, assembled in arms, and proceeded to the banks of the ⁵Gweryd in the North; and there they were long disputing who should take the lead through the river Gweryd. Then Run dispatched a messenger to Gwynedd, to ascertain who were entitled to the lead: some say, that Maeldav the elder, the lord of ⁶Penardd, adjudged it to the men of Arvon; Iorwerth the son of Madog, on the authority of his own information, affirms that Idno the aged assigned it to the men of the black-headed shafts. And thereupon the men of Arvon advanced in the van, and were valorous there: and Taliesin sang—

Behold! from the ardency of their blades,
With Run the reddener of armies,
The men of Arvon with their ruddy lances.

And then on account of the length of time they remained in arms, their wives slept with their bond servants: and on that account Run granted them fourteen privileges.

1. The first is, precedence of a wife; and the precedence is, as to tame horses, his swine, his geese, and a car, and any two oxen he may please of the herd; and the car full of such furniture as he may please.
2. The second is, the van of Gwynedd in the hosts.
3. The third is, ⁷that he pay not for his beast.
4. The fourth is, to settle the limits of the districts bordering upon Arvon.

⁵ The efflux of the Mewydus, a rivulet, now called 'Cadnant' or 'battle-brook,' which flows by the town of Caernarvon into the Menai: the place where Elidyr fell has preserved the name of 'Elidyr bank.' A principal residence of Maelgwn was Caer Seiont or Segontium, near Caernarvon.

⁶ Perhaps the river Wear.

⁷ The ground on the west side of the river Seiont, opposite the town of Caernarvon.

If one of those we have mentioned above does not will to submit to the decision of the three tavodiogs, and the other wills it ; the law requires submission to their decision.

If one of two parties between whom a lawsuit has taken place deny the judgment, and the other acknowledge it ; the statement of the judge is, in that case, final respecting his judgment.

7. The fifth is a surety, respecting his suretiship :

If he be acknowledged, and the one party should say, that the suretiship is for a great matter, and the other, that it is for a small matter ; since the surety has been acknowledged, he is to be believed as to what it has been given for ; and what he says cannot be denied.

If a man should give a thing, and one of two men should say : ' It was given to me ; ' and the other say : ' No, to me it was given ; ' his word is decisive, in what manner he gave it, and in what manner he did not give it.

9. The seventh is a maid, respecting her maidenhood ; which is thus :

If a man should take away a maid clandestinely, and after conducting her to a lonely place, and before connexion with her, she should ask him : ' What wilt thou give to me for this ? ' and he minutely question her how much he shall give ; and afterwards repent it : though he should deny it, if she confess it, her evidence there is decisive.

10. The eighth is the herdsman of a hamlet :

If a beast belonging to any person be killed by the animals of other owners, and it be inquired into ; the testimony of the herdsman is decisive, as to which ox killed the other.

VI. OF THE CLAIM OF SURETY AND DEBTOR, THIS TREATS.

1. If a person give surety to another, for any thing, it is right for him to release the surety, by one of the three means which release a surety: either by paying for him; or by giving pledge; or by denying surety.

2. If he willeth to deny, a surety is to be thus denied: let the two parties, and the surety, come before the judge; and the judge is to seek from both parties an acknowledgement whether, 'Yonder man be a surety, or not a surety?' 'A surety, God knows,' says the creditor: 'Not a surety, God knows,' says the debtor. Then it is right for the judge to ask the surety: 'Art thou a surety?' 'I am,' replies the surety. 'It is wholly denied,' says the debtor: 'thou art not surety for me; neither for that, nor for any thing.' 'God knows,' says the surety, 'in the best manner a surety is to insist that he is a surety, do I insist on my being surety.' 'God knows,' says the debtor: 'in the best manner a debtor is to deny surety, I will deny it.' Then it is right for the judge to ascertain in what manner he is to deny it. Now the law in this case provides, since there is only his own evidence in the matter prosecuting it, there is to be only the evidence of the debtor to deny it. 'Yes,' says the debtor: 'I will deny him.' Then it is right for the judge to take the relic in his hand, and say to the debtor: 'The protection of God prevent thee! and the protection of the Pope of Rome! and the protection of thy lord! do not take a false oath.' If he will then take the oath, let him swear to God, in the first place, and to the relic that is in the hand of the judge, that he is not surety for him; neither for what he asserts, nor for any thing. If the surety do not counter-swear, let the debtor be free from the claim on account of his denial, and let the surety pay the creditor his full demand. If the surety counter-swear to the debtor, let him counter-swear whilst the debtor is putting his lips to the relic, after he has sworn; and thus he shall counter-swear: 'By the relic that is there, I am surety for thee in the matter we have mentioned; and thou hast perjured thyself; and by the counter-oath I have sworn against thee, I will have the judgment of the judge.' And then it is right for the judge to go out, to give judgment; and the law requires in that case the oath of the debtor, one of seven, to deny his suretiship: six men, and himself the seventh; four of them of kin to his father, and two of kin to his mother, and himself the seventh: and these persons are to be so nearly related to him, as to participate in paying galanas, and in receiving it along with him.

3. The period of that raith is a week from the following Sunday; and the place where that raith is to be given is the church wherein he shall hear mass; and the time for receiving that raith is between the 'Benedicamus,' and distributing the sacramental bread. And if he obtain that raith, it is sufficient for him; but if he be unable to obtain it, let him pay the claim: and, if the lord be minded to prosecute him for perjury, let him proceed.

4. Whatsoever surety shall counter-swear against a debtor, shall be free from the claim and the suretiship; because he has fulfilled the requisites of a surety.

5. Whatsoever surety shall not counter-swear ⁷⁹against the debtor, let him pay the due and claim himself; for he has not performed the requisites of a surety which a surety should fulfil.

6. When a surety shall acknowledge to the judge that he is a surety, it is right for the creditor then to attest his acknowledgement, lest he should recede from it another time.

10. If a person suppose a surety is freed from his suretiship, by paying part of the debt, and not paying the whole; we say that he shall not be free, and that he is surety for the last penny as well as for the first.

11. If there be an acknowledged surety for a thing, and there be a denial on the part of the debtor as to payment, it is right for the surety to give a legal pledge ¹⁶to the plaintiff: a legal pledge is a third more than the demand.

12. If there be an obstruction to giving a pledge, the surety must accompany the pledge, together with the creditor, to a place of safety; and he is himself to receive the first stick-blow, if there be fighting; and if he do not thus, let him pay the debt himself.

13. If a surety endeavour to take a pledge without 'the debtor,' without urging the claim on the debtor, he is not to take away the pledge. A surety is not to take away a pledge without the debtor, unless there be a denial, face to face, in his presence.

14. If he has seen a prior denial against the creditor, he then may give a lawful pledge belonging to the debtor, to the creditor, in his absence.

15. If the debtor permit the surety to give a pledge of one pound in lieu of one penny, and before the time of the pledge, the pledge be lost; the law does not require him to pay back more than a halfpenny; for that is the third of a legal penny.

16. If a person give the value of a pound in lieu of one penny in pledge, and the pledge lapse, 'nothing whatever is adjudged to the debtor; for he himself debased the privilege of his pledge.

17. Whoever shall give an acknowledged pledge, and imagine, because there is no surety for it, that the pledge is insecure; we say, that that pledge lapses, and that it is secure.

pledge for a small matter, it is lawful for the creditor to receive what is given to him, whatever its amount, in pledge; and, although he may lose it, before the time, he is to restore only a third to the surety, who deposited it with him; nevertheless the surety must fully indemnify the debtor, because he took it unlawfully.

19. If there be surety for twelve pence, and the time of the twelve pence arrive, and the debtor have nothing, except a horse worth ²⁵one pound, or ²⁶ten pounds; and the creditor, with the surety, come to demand the twelve pence, and the debtor say: 'I have not wherewith to pay you, except my horse; and that I will neither give to you, nor pledge:' in that case the surety is not to take the pledge from him; and the creditor is not to take the pledge of the surety; but both parties are to proceed to the lord, and declare to him: 'There is yonder only a great matter; and a great matter is not to be taken in pledge for a small matter:' then it is right for the lord to give permission to the surety to give a great pledge in lieu of the small matter, lest the creditor suffer loss.

20. If a person give surety to another for a debt, and after giving the surety flee to sanctuary, to avoid paying the debt; we say, that he is not to have sanctuary against that; and that the surety is to give a pledge to the creditor, or otherwise deny his suretiship.

21. No person is to take a surety for one day; for, if he does not claim on that day, has not the time arrived when he has no surety?

22. A man is not to take a debtor as surety, for they are two arddelws, and he shall only choose his arddelw; if of suretiship he choose his arddelw, there is no debtor; if of debtor he choose, there is no surety: on that account no individual can be both surety and debtor.

23. A surety is not to take a ⁸⁶hold or' pledge from the debtor while engaged in his lord's business or his own, or while ill; and the creditor is not to take a pledge from the surety during such time.

24. 'Three times the surety is to seek the debtor at his resort before taking his hold : and if thereby he do not find him, it is free for him to give his hold to the creditor.'

25. If a person take surety for property from another, and after that the debtor be banished, either on account of murder, or for theft, or for any other illegal acts, so that he ought not to be in the country, and the creditor demand the property from the surety ; then the law sees that it is right for them to divide the loss equally between them ; that is, the surety to pay one half to the creditor : for it is hard for the surety to pay the whole, and he innocent ; and hard for the creditor to lose the whole, by relying upon the surety. And here is one of the three instances where the law shares property according to the law of 'Howel.'

26. If the debtor afterwards return to the country, they are to enforce the repayment of their property from him ; and then it is right for the surety to receive the half of that property. And here is the instance of the surety being the enforcer of property to himself.

27. If there be surety for a debt, and before the time of payment the surety die, and leave a son, the son ought to be responsible for the father's debts. Some say, if that son willeth to deny his suretiship ;
over the grave of his father the legal denial is to be given : we say it ought not to be ;
for the learned say, that the law of this world can affect a person, whether he be gone to heaven or to hell, only until he goes to this earth. The cause is, that, though there may be law between man and man upon this earth, there is no law between devil and devil, and there is no law between angel and angel, only the will of God ; and therefore, a person that leaves this earth, cannot be affected by law ; but the others who remain are to act together :

and therefore, it is right for the son of that surety who is dead to stand legally for the father, as the father must have stood, if living : and, if he have no son, the lord is to act as a son to him ; and, if it be necessary to compel him, he is to be compelled, as the surety ought to be, if living.

28. If a person take surety from another for any thing, and before the time of payment comes, the debtor die ; the surety is to compel the son of the debtor, in the same manner as the debtor, if living. If he have no son, let the lord stand in his place, and pay for him, or deny it : and if he willeth to deny it, let him deny it, as the man would himself, to whom he became a son for his property ; and, since he preferred becoming a son to that man, on account of his property, to being a lord, let him be in the privilege of the man to whom he became a son, on account of his property, and deny the suretiship one of seven ; and those persons are not to be of kin to the "debtor, but of kin to the king ; for the family of the "debtor is not related to the king though the king may deny the surety.

29. Where a denial by the son may occur of his father's suretiship, no person of his mother's kindred is to deny anything for his father.

30. There are three useless suretiships: the first of them is, when a person shall purchase any thing from another, for money, and take surety 'for it, and surety be not taken for the money ;' and the owner of the money repent of his bargain, as he willeth not to avail himself of the surety, which he has for the thing he purchased ; and the other has no surety for the money, to bind him to his bargain ; therefore the surety is useless on either side, since the purchaser wills not the bargain to stand.

31. The second is ; if a person give a surety to another on a thing insecure, as a thing secure, and the owner of the property come to claim it ; it is right for the owner to obtain his property ; though a surety has been given for the thing, it ought not to have been given ; and it is not right that the purchaser should part with it until an equivalent pledge be received from the ⁷⁵'arwaesav.' If the arwaesav say, that he is to pay only so much as he obtained for the ⁷⁶'horse ; we say, that he is to pay the legal worth of the ⁷⁷'horse, whatever sort of ⁷⁸'horse it may be : and because the surety cannot perform his suretiship, on that account it is called an useless surety. As to the questionable property we have here mentioned, whoever shall be in fault as to its removal, let the lord prosecute him.

32. The third is, a female surety is no surety ; that is to say, a woman is not to be a surety, because women cannot deny a surety ; nor is she to have a raith of men to deny it. ³²The law, however, says that surety given by a woman is a surety ; because whoever can inquire into the right to property, the law enacts it to be legal for that person to warrant it ; and since a woman can inquire into the right to property, we say that it is indispensable to take surety for dilysrwydd from her also ; and that the surety she may give is a surety : for since a man can deny her, she is also to have men with her to deny a surety.

33. If a woman give her ³³'briduw' for any thing, and she deny it legally ; we say that ³⁴'women shall deny it with her.

34. Some say, that a pledge does not lapse from the hand of a surety until the end of a year and a day : we say that the pledge lapses from the hands of three persons at its maturity ; and those three persons are, a surety, a lord, and the owner of the property. The cause is, because the lord is surety for all acknowledged property for which there is no surety ; and therefore, the pledge lapses from his hand, or from the hands of his ³⁵'servants.

nor from the hand of a surety, ²nor from the hand of his servant, is there a necessity for dilysrwydd of a pledge; since they do not deny its being given, they are sureties for the dilysrwydd of that pledge for ever.

36. The lord is the surety for every acknowledged property, for which there is no surety.

37. From the owner of property surety is to be taken for the dilysrwydd of the pledge, lest he deny it another time, from coveting either the property, or any other thing he had not given.

38. No one is to say that he will not become surety for another, if he be such a person as ought to become surety.

39. Many persons are not to become surety, or to give a surety; and the cause for that is, since they are not to deny a surety they are not to give a surety; such are, a monk, an eremite, a foreigner, a scholar of a school, and every person who cannot come without the permission of another to attend the courts.

40. If a person give surety for a debt ³³for a time, and the time fall upon one of the three principal festivals, Easter, Whitsuntide, or Christmas, though he claim it, he shall lose nothing but his time. If he urge his claim on Christmas day, he shall not obtain an answer until the morning after the calends; if he urge it upon Easter day, on the Tuesday next after little Easter day he shall have an answer; if on Whitsunday, on Tuesday next after the Sunday following Whitsunday there shall be an answer given to him: and those three weeks, an account of their privilege, are called blank days.

41. It is not necessary to take a surety for the dilysrwydd of money, nor transferable trinkets, such as a bandlet, a knife, a girdle, nor yet for arms.

42. If a surety and a debtor meet upon a bridge formed of one tree, the latter ought not to refuse doing one of three things; either to pay, to 'give a pledge,' or to go to law; and he is not to move his foot, without doing one of these three things : if he refuse to do any one of those three things, let the surety then deliver his pledge to the creditor : if the other prefer it, let him apply to the law without delay.

43. There is to be no time granted for aid in a suit between surety and debtor ; for it is to be without delay.

44. If the creditor decline law before the judge, the surety is free, and the other loses his claim ; for the claim exists only while there is a surety. If the debtor decline law, and the surety is an acknowledged surety, and the claim pending ; the surety is to enforce full payment to the creditor.

45. If it happen that two persons have a law-suit between them, and one of them require surety in law, and the other say that he ought not to give surety in law, but that he ought to have time for aid ; and the creditor say : ' God knows, I am entitled to surety ; he owes a surety who owes nothing.' ' God knows,' says the other, ' he is no surety who is surety for nothing ; and I owe thee nothing ; for it is acknowledged by thyself, that I owe thee nothing, ³⁹and nothing is no debt.' We say, that he is not entitled to surety in law ; since the other has avouched by time for aid, ⁴⁵and if he were to give surety, law without delay would be proper ; and there is no time in a suit of surety and debtor.

46. ⁵⁰There are three denials of delusive suretiships : the first is, if a person happen to buy a thing from another, and call for surety for dilysrwydd ; and he who sold it say : ' I will give it,' and extend his hand towards his surety, without the hand of either of them meeting, and the surety put his hand in the hand of the creditor ; though the creditor be entitled to a reply from the surety he has accepted legally, the debtor is not to reply to the creditor as to any thing, for he legally accepted the suretiship from his hand.

47. The second is, if a person make a promise for another and give surety thereon, and he for whom the surety is given will not abide by the suretiship so given for him ; he may recede from his bargain, for he has made no promise of anything ; and, nevertheless, he who gave the surety must abide by his undertaking and his promise: and that sort of suretiship is called delusive, on account of his having promised for a person he could not bring to fulfil it.

48. The third is, if a person happen to demand a surety, and the debtor extend his hand towards the surety, and the surety towards the creditor, and the hand of neither come into the hand of the other; the debtor is not to answer for any thing to the surety, nor the surety to the creditor; since neither of them has lawfully accepted the other: on that account it is called a delusive suretiship.'

VII. CONCERNING A BRIDUW THIS TREATS.

1. If a person give his briduw to another for any thing, let him either pay or deny, as the law shall say: the law says, unless he be counter-sworn against, that his own oath is sufficient to deny it; but, if there be a counter-oath against him, let him then call for judgment; and the law requires from him the oaths of seven to deny it; four of kin to his father, and two of kin to his mother, and he himself the seventh. The time for that raith is a week from the Sunday following; and if the raith be obtained, it is sufficient: if he fail in his raith; his camlwrw to the king, and let the church proceed against him, and let him pay the debt in full.

2. ³³This is concerning briduw.' If a person ³³give a briduw, or' accept a briduw from another, and say, that the briduw is for twenty-four pence, and the other say and confess that there is a briduw for six pence; the law says that it is incumbent upon him to make a declaration as to what his briduw is for, whether for twenty-four pence, or for six pence, since he does not deny his briduw; ⁴⁰and that by his oath upon the relic.'

3. ⁴⁸Though it should be said to be a briduw,' we say, it is not a briduw, unless the three hands meet; and there is no surety nor ⁵⁴'gorvodog' unless the three hands shall meet.

witnesses, and subsequently willeth to deny it; we say that he is not to deny it, unless the other's witnesses shall fail.

7. If a person make a promise to another, concerning a thing, without witnesses present, that is no contract; and since no contract, let him deny on his own oath.

8. No person is to make a contract for another, because a contract only continues during the life of the person who makes it.

9. The father cannot make a contract for the son, but by the permission of the son; neither can the son make a contract to affect the father, and the father yet living.

10. A contract breaks a custom.

11. Although a contract be made contrary to the law, 'it must be kept.'

IX. OF 'GORVODOGAETH' THIS TREATS.

1. Whoever shall take another upon ²⁶his gorvodogaeth, let him be liable to every punishment which may be on the person he took to him.

2. If he willeth to be borne harmless by the person for whom he has engaged to answer, let him take sureties from that person for the peril; and unless he so take, although he is to do right as to his gorvodogaeth ³⁴for the person, 'the person is not to do him any right, since he made him no promise. If the gorvodog take sureties from the homicide for the peril and for being borne harmless, there shall be no protection for him against those sureties.

3. If a person take another upon his gorvodogaeth for a time, and before the time the gorvodog is disavowed by the homicide; let the gorvodog pay for him in full.

4. If a person promise to secure a thing to another, it is for himself to declare what he shall secure, whether little or much; since he himself was credited.

X. [OF CHURCH PROTECTION.]

the prerogative of the king, who gave them that sanctuary, to determine in what manner he gave them such sanctuary; and if he gave it to his own detriment, let them keep what he may have given them.

3. All possessors of church land are to come to every new king who succeeds, to declare to him their privilege and their obligation; and the cause why they shall declare them to him is, lest the king be deceived: and after they may have declared to him their privilege, if the king see their privilege to be right, let the king continue to them their sanctuary and their privilege.

4. If a person do an illegal act, and, on account of that illegal act, seek protection, and, while under that protection, a suit arise against him; neither the abbots nor the priests are to conduct him until he do right for that first illegal act: if no suit be commenced against him, let them conduct him to the place to which they ought to conduct him.

5. If a person do a wrong, to the value of a penny, from out the sanctuary, and a suit arise against him for the illegal act he committed from out the sanctuary; he is not to be defended ⁵⁴by the abbots' by the protection under which he did the wrong, unless he obtain another protection anew in another church.

6. Whoever shall take protection, is to walk about within the church-yard and the burial-ground, without relics upon him; and his cattle are to be with the cattle of the community and the abbots to the furthest limits they go and return to their cow-lair again.

7. If a person have relics upon him, and does an illegal act under the relics, he is not to have protection nor defence through those relics; for he has not deserved it.

8. The measure of the burying-ground is a legal ⁸⁴'erw' in length, with its end to the church-yard; and that, circling the church-yard, is to be its compass.

9. If any church should declare, that it can keep a person in its sanctuary for seven years, without his doing right, or for a longer period; and the lord of the country oppose this declaration, and say, that no such privilege originated from him to it; it is necessary for the church to have that privilege secured by respectable customary witnesses: if it can do so, let its privilege be preserved undisturbed; and if it fail, let the church conduct him as it best may, or let him do right for the illegal act which he committed.

XI. HERE BEGIN THE LAWS CONCERNING LANDED PROPERTY, AND THE FORM OF PLEADING IN RESPECT THERETO.

1. Twice the law shall be open for landed property, and twice it shall be closed.

2. From the ninth of the calends of winter it shall be open until the ninth day of February.

3. From the ninth day of February the law shall be closed unto the ninth day of May.

4. From the ninth day of May the law shall be open until the ninth day of August.

5. From the ninth day of August the law shall be closed until the ninth day of the calends of winter.

6. The reason why the law shall be closed in autumn and spring, is, because the land is cultivated during those two periods; lest ploughing in the spring and reaping in autumn be impeded.

7. The cause why it is right for the law to be closed for nine days after the calends of winter, and nine days after the feast of St. Bridget to be open; is to avoid closing the law on one day: and in the same manner, nine days after the calends of May to be closed, and nine days after August to be open; to avoid opening the law on one day likewise.

8. Whoever willeth to institute a suit for landed property, let him do it when he will, from the ninth of the calends of winter forwards, or from the ninth of May; because those are the times the law is open for landed property.

9. If a plaintiff willeth to claim land at those times, let him appear before the lord, to request a day for hearing his claim; and that upon the land: on that day, let him state his claim; but he is not to have an answer on that day, because it is a sudden claim upon the ^aguardians, and therefore the guardians are to have time for aid: it is right for the plaintiff to oppose their obtaining it, if he can do so; unless the law say that they are to have it. Then it is right for the judge to hear them, and to ask them where are their aids; if they say that their aids are in their own cymwd, three days are allowed them; if in the adjoining cymwd, nine days; if in the third cymwd, or if flood and ebb be between them and their aid, if before mid-day the time be fixed, a fortnight from that day is the time; if after mid-day the time be fixed, a fortnight from the morrow following: the cause of that is, because it is not an entire day, and that it is not right to compute part of a day for a whole day.

10. And at the time appointed it is right for every person to come upon that land, they and their aid; and then it is right to form two parties, and sit legally. The legal form of sitting is as follows: first, the king, or his representative, with his back to the sun or to the weather, lest the weather incommode his face; and the judge of the court, or the judge of the cymwd, whoever is the oldest, is to sit before him; and at that person's left hand, the ^aother judge' that may be in the field, or the ^bjudges; and upon his right hand, the priest or priests, if there be any in the field; and next the lord, or his representative, the two elders, and then his gwrdas in succession on each side of him: then a passage for the judges, opposite them, to pass and repass to their judgment-seat: then the ^bpleader for the plaintiff, with his left hand to the passage; next to him, in the middle, the plaintiff, and his ^bguider on the other hand; and an apparitor standing behind the pleader: and the other party on the other side of the passage; nearest to the passage the pleader for the defendant, with his right hand to the passage; and the defendant next to him, in the middle, and his guider on the other side of him; and an apparitor behind him.

17. Here is that which it is right for the plaintiff to say: stating that he is the true proprietor of the land here, and of the soil: and, if there be who shall doubt his being the true proprietor of this land and soil, that he has those who can support his title, by kin and descent, sufficient in law; and that he has been unlawfully ejected from his propriety: and if there be who shall doubt it, that he has enow who know of his having been unlawfully ejected from his propriety; and that he is therefore appealing to the law, that he is entitled to come lawfully back to the place from which he has been unlawfully ejected.

19. 'God knows,' says the defendant, 'I am the true proprietor by kin and descent, and therefore I am guarding my estate and my propriety in the best manner I ought to guard it; and, if there be who shall doubt that, I have enow to prove what I say to be true: and thou, if thou hast been here, thou hast gone lawfully from hence; and should there be who shall doubt that, I have enow who know it.'

20. We say, although the defendant shall have given an answer before he has been questioned by the plaintiff, the answer is nugatory until he hear the claim; and then let him answer.

21. And after they have finished their two pleadings, in the manner we have said above, let the judge ask them, whether that which they have said will suffice; and let him ask them whether they will to amend their pleadings; and if there be who should will it, let him be permitted; and if no one will it, let the judge take their two pleadings, and state them; and after he shall have stated them, let the judges go out, and the priests ⁶²or the priest' along with them, and an apparitor with them, to prevent other persons from coming to listen to them. Then, after they shall be seated in their judgment-place, it is right for the priest to pray to God, that God may shew them the right, and for them to chaunt their Pater; and after the Pater it is right for the judge to state the two pleadings a second time.

22. And, if it should be necessary for them to ^ainterrogate, let two of them be deputed to question. And if it should be necessary for the party interrogated to consult, let them go, with the permission of the judges, to their consultation; and the number to go are those taking part in the pleadings, and no more, with a servant sent by the lord with them, to prevent any person from taking a part in the consultation with them; and if any person come and should counsel them, let him pay a camlwrw to the king, and the counsel be nugatory; ⁴⁵and the distance they are to go to take counsel is to be as far as the judges go to settle their decision.' And, after the consultation shall be ended, let those two come to the judges and state to them the consultation.

23. If no interrogation be necessary, it is right to permit them their arddelw; and to send ^btwo men' to inquire who are their evidences and their guardians, and where they are: if they say that they are in the field, let them be brought forward; if they say that they are in the same cymwd with them, let a period of three days be given them; if they say, that they are in the next cymwd, let a period of nine days be granted them; if they say that they are in another country, or that they are separated from them by flood and ebb, a period of a fortnight from that day, if it be before mid-day; if after mid-day, a fortnight from the morrow following; and that day a day to lose and gain: and the pledges to be in the king's prison until that day; and every one ordered to come prepared with all their requisites on that day to the field: whether the two parties be assenting or not, is it not a day for legal decision?

24. On the third day after coming face to face, it is right for every body to sit in his place, in the same manner as he sat on the former day: and if any of the persons be dead who attended the pleadings at their commencement, others are to be put in their places. And after they are so seated, it is then right for the plaintiff to tender his requisites, including his witnesses, and his guardians, and say, that he is prepared, ²⁰having his requisites with him, as he promised.' Then it is right for the defendant to reply; and the answer he is to give is, that he is prepared, having his requisites with him, as he promised. Then it is right for the king to order the pledges to be shewn in the field, for they are the sureties. And then, after the pledges are shewn, it is right for the king to order the apparitor to proclaim silence in the field: and then it is right for the judge to announce the punishment for breach of silence, that is, three kine as camlwrw, ²⁵or nine score of silver', and the word spoken to be nugatory. And then it is right for the plaintiff to remind the judges, that it is he who first promised his witnesses and his guardians; and that he is entitled to examine them first. Then it is right for the ²⁶judges to order him to produce his guardians and his witnesses, to be examined; and then it is right for him to bring them near him and show them; and those he ²⁷promised are such as he ²⁸named on the first day. The defendant is not then to object to any of them ²⁹before hearing their evidence; because he knows not but what they may say may be advantageous to him; and whichsoever of them he may object to, before knowing what he may say; let such one stand. The defendant, however, may ask, whether they have privilege, ³⁰so that they ought to be witnesses'; and if they have, let them come forward: and the cause why he may ask that is, that an alltud cannot be an evidence concerning an hereditary 'Cymro;' and neither can a woman concerning a man: and, in addition to that, there are many persons who cannot be evidences, nor guardians, on account of privilege; and therefore it can be no detriment to the defendant to say that.

25. If the defendant promised witnesses better than those promised by the plaintiff; either from their privilege being higher, or from their being more numerous; and he willeth to support that point, it is right for him to shew them; and after he shall have shewn the witnesses, it is not right for the plaintiff then to object to them. And then it is right for the judge to ask the plaintiff: 'What is the privilege of thy witnesses?' Then it is right for the plaintiff to state the privilege of his witnesses, whether maers, or canghellors, whether monks, or teachers, whether priests or scholars, or privileged laymen. After the judge has asked the plaintiff the privilege of his witnesses, it is right for the judge to ask the defendant the privilege of his witnesses; and then it is right for the defendant to state the best privilege of his witnesses. Then it is right for the judge to recapitulate the privilege ascribed by the two parties to their witnesses.

26. Then it is right for the judge to ask the evidences, will they abide by what is required at their hands. Here all the evidences say, they will. Here all of the two parties doubt the evidences of each other, that they will not carry it to the extremity, though they may so speak: then it is right for the judges to put them to the relics; and after they shall have put them to the relics, it is right for them to withdraw, and decide upon what they deem most right from what they have heard. And if they see that the witnesses of one party are better than those of the other, let them decide against him who has the worst witnesses: if their witnesses be equal, let it be decided against the defendant; for he promised witnesses which should be better than the other's, and he failed. And then it is right for the judges to decide for the plaintiff to take the land, in the condition it was in, when he was unlawfully ejected from it. ¹⁴If the defendant had promised equal witnesses, and they had been found equal, it would have been an equality, and it should have been shared'.

27. After that it is right for the judges to prove the guardians, to ascertain whether all of them affirm that the party they uphold be a proprietor; and if the guardians of both parties affirm that each is a proprietor, and they be doubted, it is right to put them to the relic; and let the party whose guardians shall recede lose the land.

28. If the guardians of both parties stand, it is an equality; and where there shall be an equality it is shared.

29. Although he be adjudged to have the land, the person who was in prior possession is not to quit on his account, if he can obtain a house with a gable in the same place, and the two lands equal, to prevent his being ejected from thence: and he is not to give unprivileged land, instead of land having privilege; such as that of the office of a canghellor, or of a maer, or other franchise.

30. Then it is right for the judges to return to their judgment place; and then it is right for them to take security from the two parties, to abide by the judgment; and take surety for their fee. Then the judges are to state the two pleadings, and after that state their judgment; and then the king is to liberate the pledges from their prison.

31. The measure of the fee of the judges for land and soil, is twenty-four of silver;

32. If a non-proprietor have guardians to prove his occupation of land and soil as the second, or third man; and a proprietor, with guardians to prove his proprietor, sue him, the non-proprietor is to relinquish possession. If he sue as second or third man against a proprietor in possession, 'the proprietor' is not to move on his account from the land. A proprietor will oust a third man: a third man will oust an inheritor, an inheritor is the son whom a father shall leave after him upon the land: an inheritor will oust a new settler, a new settler is a person who comes of himself upon the land, without any one of his kin possessing it before him. And in that manner their privilege proceeds, as their pre-occupation may be.
³⁵Others say, that a proprietor cannot oust a proprietor, and that one non-proprietor cannot oust another, and, therefore, that a third man cannot oust an inheritor, nor an inheritor oust a new settler: for that none of them are proprietors until the fourth man, and so one non-proprietor cannot oust another.'

he take it, and lawfully lose it, it shall not be recovered for him; because he accepted of an insecurity instead of a security.

36. A joint-proprietor is not to give to another land to which no service is attached, in lieu of land to which service is attached, unless it be his own will; and if he take it, let him lose his privilege.

37. What plaintiff soever shall produce witnesses ⁴or guardians for land and soil, ⁵on the day to lose or gain, and the defendant produces ⁶others against him; then the law says, that his arddelw is not to be taken, nor that of any one of them, until the arddelw shall fail him. And then it is right to ask them, who are their arddelw and their witnesses, and where they are; and, if they be not in the field, let time be given to produce them, according to the place they may be in, as the law says. If they be in the field, let those of the plaintiff be first examined; and if those of the plaintiff be not in the field, those for the defendant are to be examined: the reason for that is, that preparedness is not to be obstructed by unpreparedness. If those of the plaintiff be in the field, it is right to show them to the judges, and to set them apart: and then it is right for the judges to take the testimony of the first that is presented to them to be examined, and to ask him: 'Is it true what the plaintiff says, or not true?' and warn him by the protection of God not to give false testimony; and if he nevertheless say, that what the plaintiff said is true; let the defendant then consider by what means he purposes to nullify the witnesses; whether by objecting to them, or by producing others more respectable and more credible. If he chuse, to object to them, and they escape his objection, his own witnesses are not to be made use of after that; only the absolved ones. If he chuse, by better witnesses; let the best be accepted; and according to the best, let judgment be given. If they be equal, let judgment be given for the plaintiff, because the defendant promised to produce better witnesses: had he promised them to be as good, it would have been an equality, and the property shared.

38. If to object to the witnesses be the will of the ¹defendant, let him object in this manner. When the witness has spoken his mind, after being questioned by the judge, let him say: 'though thou hast so spoken, thou wilt not carry it to the extremity.' If then the witness shall say: 'To the extremity,' and swear it; let the other counter-swear against him, that he has sworn falsely; and in addition to that: 'Thy word is not to be taken against me:' and then it is right for him to bring against him one of the three legal things; either land-detention, or galanas, or nearer affinity to the ²plaintiff than to him; and, except the witness deny that, to wit, what is urged against him, let him be rejected; and, if he deny, let him stand; unless the defendant urge, by other witnesses, that that objection is valid against him, and those witnesses in the field, and, if they be not in the field, let the witnesses for the plaintiff stand; for no time is due to one witness against another. And 'if the plaintiff can produce either two, or three, or more unimpeached witnesses, as we have said before, let the cause be adjudged for him. Some say, that adultery is a fourth objection; the law, however, says, that this relates to family enmity, and that it is of the third.

39. If the two parties commit their arddelw to the witnesses, and neither object to the witnesses of the other; let those that are of the best privilege, most respectable and most numerous, influence the judgment. If the witnesses be equally efficient, let the matter in dispute be shared: and that is the law of equality.

40. This is concerning the raiths. The first of them is the oath of the guardians.

Guardians are to swear the same kind of oath as the criminal shall swear before them, in every point; and they are to swear neither through hatred, nor enmity, nor for reward, nor for worth, nor for anything, but to guard the truth.

41. There is no objecting to a guardian.

A guardian is not to be objected to, if he be privileged: for he causes no injury to any one; but guards the property for the owner.

42. This is the oath of a witness.

A witness is to swear, that what he affirms is true; and that it is not through hatred, nor through enmity, that he swears; and therefore, since a witness may cause injury to a person, he can be objected to by that person.

43. This is the oath of a "nod" raith-man.

A nod raith-man is to swear, that he considers the oath of the person with whom he shall swear to be pure; and if one nod man fail, the whole raith fails.

44. This is the oath of another raith-man.

Another raith-man is to swear, that what is sworn by the criminal is most likely to be true; and though a third of the common raith should fail, according to the two parts judgment is to be pronounced.

45. If a person promise a stated number of witnesses; let him fulfil, or fail. If he promise a sufficiency in law; two or three will suffice, though a greater number would be better.

46. The testimony of one person is no testimony.

47. If a person, on the day to lose or gain, seek delay, on account of his arwaesav or his witnesses being sick, or "other obstacles"; the law says, that will not avail him, since he did not fulfil the thing which he promised.

48. If the day to lose or gain happen at a time when the court is closed for landed property, or during the blank days; some say that proceedings must be re-commenced at a time when the court is again open: the law, however, says, that there is nothing that should put off the day to lose or gain, except one thing; and that is, when the judge does not recollect the judgment concerning it: and if it be doubted, let him be put to the relic; and then a period of nine days is granted for the judge to recollect, and to confer with men who may be of longer experience than himself: and 'on the ninth day,' let the judgment be stated to both parties, and that without pleading.

49. If the period be delayed, either by 'the death of the judge,' or by any other occurrence, or by the contumacy of the plaintiff, who came not to hear the judgment, let the defendant have possession from that time forward.

50. If a person, when sued in a cause respecting landed property, should say, that he will not do right; and the plaintiff attest to the lord, his judges, and his gwrdas, that he has not denied the claim, and that he is an oppressor; and call for judgment: then it is right, if he allow judgment to be passed, in the field, against him, to deprive him of his possession for ever.

51. If he quit the field unlawfully, he is to be dispossessed during the life of the lord who is supreme over the court on that day: for he shall not be comprehended within a district who will not do justice.

52. Whatever defendant, with whom a pleader and guider shall stand, and he himself the third, may seek for delay for aid, he is not to obtain it; for those persons are his legal aid.

53. No pleader, nor guider is to stand with any one in a cause of less value than three score pence, or for landed property, a horse, or an ox. ³⁰Others say, that no one is to have pleader and guider in a suit respecting silver and animals.

54. It is free at any time to determine boundaries.

55. The law is not closed for church land at any time among themselves; for it did not emanate from our law: if the clergy sue us, or we them, it is closed.

56. Land may be shared at any time, unless it be denied that the share is due, though the courts be closed.

XII. THE LAW OF BROTHERS FOR LAND.

1. Thus brothers are to share land between them: four erws to every ¹'tyddyn': Bleddyn, ²son of Cynvyn, altered it to twelve erws to the uchelwr, and eight to the aillt, and ³'four to the ⁴'godacog': yet nevertheless, it is most usual that ⁵'four erws be the tyddyn'.

2. The measure of the legal ¹erw is, four feet in the length of the short yoke, and eight in the length of the ²'second yoke,' and twelve in the length of the lateral yoke, and sixteen in the long yoke; and a rod as long as that, in the hand of the driver, with his other hand upon the middle spike of the ³long yoke, and as far as he can reach with that rod on each side of him, is the breadth of the erw; and thirty times that is the length. Others say, that it is to be a rod as long as the tallest man in the ⁴'trew,' with his hand above his head, and proceeding in a similar manner as in the other.

3. If there be no buildings on the land, the youngest son is to divide all the patrimony, and the eldest is to choose; and each, in seniority, choose, unto the youngest. If there be buildings, the youngest brother but one is to divide the tyddyns, for in that case he is the meter; and the ¹youngest to have his choice of the tyddyns: and after that he is to divide all the patrimony; and, by seniority they are to choose unto the youngest: and that division is to continue during the lives of the brothers.

4. And after the brothers are dead, the first cousins are to equalize, if they will it; and thus they are to do: the heir of the youngest brother is to equalize, and the heir of the eldest brother is to choose, and so by seniority unto the youngest: and that distribution is to continue between them during their lives.

² No erw in the 'register land' escheats to the lord.

5. And if the second cousins should dislike the distribution which took place between their parents, they also may co-equate in the same manner as the first cousins; and after that division no one is either to distribute or to co-equate. ⁶ Here-ditary land is to be treated as we have above stated.

6. ⁶ Geldable land, however, is not to be divided between brothers, but the maer and canghellor are to share it equally between all in the trew; and on that account it is called register land: and there is to be no ⁶ extinguished erw in the register land; but if there should be an erw of that description in it, the maer and canghellor are to share it in common among all; to one as well as to another. And no one is to remove from his legal tyddyn, if an equivalent can be obtained for it of other land.

7. And, as we have said above respecting the other, so the maer is to proceed as to the land of the maer-trew, leaving every one in his tyddyn, according as he best may.

8. No land is to be without a king. If it be abbey land, he is to have, if they be laics, dirwy, and camlwrw, and amobyr, and ebediw, and hosts, and theft. ³⁴ If it be bishop land, he is to have hosts and theft. If it be hospital land, he is to have theft ³⁷ and fighting. And, therefore, there is no land without him.

9. When the bishop dies, all his property belongs to the king; for every property without an owner is waif to the king, except vestments and ornaments of the church, and what shall pertain to it.

10. There are 'three superiorities' that can make their capitular regulations themselves, and by their own law, where they shall not contravene the law of the king: these are, an abbot, a bishop in his own jurisdiction, and the master of 'an hospital:' each in his jurisdiction.

XIII. THE LAW OF 'DADENHUDD' FOR LAND AND SOIL.

1. There are three kinds of dadenhudds of land; and those dadenhudds are, a dadenhudd by tith and ploughing, a dadenhudd by car, and a dadenhudd by bundle and burden.

2. And these dadenhudds are not to be prosecuted except by the son, in the place where his father was theretofore, or in the place where his parents were formerly; for a dadenhudd is not to be sued by kin and descent.

3. Whoever is to prosecute dadenhudd by tith and ploughing, is to remain upon the land, without answering, until he may turn his back on the stack of the forthcoming harvest, and that without answering to any one, and then answer; and the ninth day from the following calends of winter, law.

4. Whoever is to prosecute dadenhudd by car, by having been with his car and his household and his hearth, belonging to himself, or to his father before him, upon that land, is to be there, without answering, until the ninth day, and then give an answer; and at the end of the second ninth day proceed to law.

5. Whoever is to prosecute dadenhudd by bundle and burden, by having been, with his bundle and his burden, and his fire, himself, and his father before him, using a hearth, upon the land, is to be there, without answering, three nights and three days, and then give an answer; and at the end of the ninth day, law.

6. And these dadenhudds are not to be adjudged to any one, unless there shall have been a grant and delivery of the land to him previously by the lord.

XIV. THUS LAND IS TO BE SUED FOR BY KIN AND DESCENT.

1. Whosoever then shall claim land and soil by kin and descent, let him show his kin to and descent from the stock from whence he is derived; and if he be a fourth man, he is a proprietor, because a fourth man become a proprietor: but a person does not in the same manner lapse from his propriety until he become an allud; for the law says, if a person remain in another country, whether on account of being banished, or for murder or other urgencies, so that he cannot revisit his country freely, the law says, that his title is not extinguished until the "ninth man", at what time soever he may come to claim it; and unless there be others occupying the land, grown into proprietors, ⁶⁶in opposition to him possessing the land, he is entitled to all that he left: and if there be others risen to be proprietors, in opposition to them, the law of equality and distribution is to take place between them; because one proprietor is not to be ousted by another.

2. If the ninth man come to claim land, his title is extinguished: and that person is to raise an outcry, that, from being a proprietor, he is becoming a non-proprietor; and then the law listens to that outcry, and assigns to him a ⁶⁷shelter; that is, as much as ⁶⁸to one of the number that were' on the land, in opposition to him: and that outcry is called an outcry ⁶⁹over the abyss': and though that outcry should be raised thereafter, it is never to be listened to. And others say that the ninth man is not to raise that outcry, but to descend from being a proprietor to be a non-proprietor.

3. None of the three claims for land and soil are to be heard in the time of closed law: those are, a claim of propriety; a claim of dadenhudd; and a claim of resistance.

XV. A WOMAN IS NOT TO HAVE PATRIMONY ACCORDING TO THE MEN OF GWYNEDD.

1. According to the men of Gwynedd a woman is not to have patrimony, because two rights are not to centre in the same person; those are, the patrimony of the husband, and her own: and since she is not to have patrimony, she is not to be given in marriage, except where her sons can obtain patrimony: ⁷⁰and if she be given, her sons are to have maternity.

2. Some say, that the sons of no woman are to have an inheritance by maternity, except the sons of one woman; and that ⁷¹one is, a woman whom her father and her brothers shall give legally in marriage to an alltud. Others say, that though her relations shall give her in marriage to an alltud; yet, if she be not given by those above named, her sons are not to have patrimony.

3. The law, nevertheless, says, that there are three women, whose sons are to have property by maternity: one of them is, a woman whom her family shall give legally to an alltud: the second is, a woman openly violated by an alltud, and, in consequence of that violation, having a son by the alltud; the law says, that since she has not lost her privilege, her son does not lose his right by maternity: the third is, a woman whom her family shall give as an hostage to a foreign country, and, in that condition of an hostage, she bear a son by an alltud; that son is entitled to inheritance by maternity.

4. There is no woman, however, who gives herself up to an alltud, whose sons can have a right by maternity.

5. Some say, concerning the sons of such women, that, though they be inheritors they are not proprietors; the law, however, says, that a proprietor is not to be ousted by a non-proprietor; and that a proprietor is to be ousted by the sons of such women as those, either from the whole, or from a part: and therefore the law allows them to be proprietors.

6. And the law moreover says, if that land have either service or privilege attached to it, that no part of it is to be possessed by the claimant, until the third man: for the privilege of a proprietor who has had pre-occupation is better than that of a new comer: and, to the third man it will be a sufficient occupation; unless this might occur, that a Welshwoman should legally have a son by an alltud chieftain; then the law allows to such a one his service and his privilege immediately.

7. A native of Powys is not entitled to maternity in Gwynedd, nor of Gwynedd in Powys; and in like manner in South Wales.

8. The father is not ¹to deteriorate, nor dispose of the rights of his son for land and soil, except during his own life ; neither is the son to deprive his father, during his life, of land and soil ; in like manner, the father is not to deprive the son of land ; and though he may deprive him, it will be recoverable, except in one case : where there shall be an agreement between father, brothers, cousins, second cousins, and the lord, to yield the land as blood-land ; and that the son cannot recover ; for peace was bought to the son by that as well as to the father : for those persons are the grades, without whose consent land cannot be assigned. And, though such a person have no land, he is not an alltud nevertheless, but an innate ²'boneddig.'

XVI. AN INNATE BONEDDIG.

1. An innate boneddig is a person who shall be complete as to origin in Wales, both by the mother and by the father.

2. The ³ecclesiastical law says again, that no son is to have the patrimony, but the eldest born to the father by the married wife : the law of Howel, however, adjudges it to the youngest son as well as to the oldest ; and decides that sin of the father, or his illegal act, is not to be brought against the son, as to his patrimony.

3. A person is not secure in taking possession of land, but by the sentence of the law, or by delivery of a lord.

4. Some say, that if a person shall be murdered on account of land, that that land is to be blood-land to his heirs ever afterwards. The law says, that no land is blood-land, except the land of a murderer, that is lawfully yielded, after there shall be nothing left belonging to the murderer, neither spear penny, nor any thing else ; and it decides, that no person is to be put to death but the murderer who does not pay the whole of the galanas. And that land is to be shared between the parties, in the same manner as the galanas is shared.

5. Whoever shall suffer his land to remain 'shared a year and a day, without disturbance, without injury, and be in the same country with him who is in possession of it; the law says, that that person is not to answer for that land afterwards; but the suit is barred, and is a claim beyond the year. Disturbance, and injury, are, to burn houses, and to break ploughs.

6. Whoever possesses land upon the margin of the shore, owns as much of the beach as the breadth of his land; and he may make a wear, or other things, thereon, if he will; but if the sea throw any things upon the land, or upon that beach, they belong to the king: for the sea is a pack-horse to the king.

7. A mill and a wear and an orchard are called the three ornaments of a kindred; and those three things are not to be shared, nor removed, but their produce shared between those who may have a right to it.

8. Laud of a 'corddian' is not to be shared as tyddyns, but as gardens; and if there be buildings thereon, the youngest son is not more entitled to them than the eldest, but they are to be shared as chambers.

9. No one is to retain gardens in his possession, on account of having manured them, for more than one year; for they are to be manured every year.

10. A fallow, two years it is to be ploughed.

11. 'Rotten-dung, truly the same.

18. No one is to 'sell land, or engage it, without the permission of a lord; but he may let it annually, if he will.

19. Men who are under abbots, and men who are under bishops, may engage their lands, with the consent of those persons, if they will.

20. The law says that uchelwrs are to exercise dominion over their alltuds, as the king is to exercise dominion over his alltuds.

21. And, as the alltuds of the king become proprietors in the fourth man after they shall have been placed upon the king's waste; so the alltuds of the uchelwrs become proprietors in the fourth man, if they have occupied the same land under them for so long a time: and, from thence-forward, they are not to go from the uchelwrs, for they are proprietors under them; and they are not to stake their propriety, one propriety in the land from whence they originate, and another here.

22. After they are become proprietors, their tyddyns 'on the land, and land to them also, they are to have; and their land, excepting such, to be plough land among them.

23. If the alltuds will to go away from their lords before they become proprietors;
they are to leave half their goods to them.

24. And, if they be natives of this island, they are not to dwell in any place on this side of Offa's dyke.

25. And, if they come from beyond sea, they are not to remain here, except until they can obtain the first favourable wind to go to their country; and, if they remain, let them return to their bondage, as before.

depart until the third fair wind.

five score trevs; and that is the cantrev rightly: ten times ten is to be in every hundred; and numeration goes no further than ten.

13. This is the number of erws in the cantrev: four legal erws ¹⁶of tillage' in every tyddyn; sixteen in every randir; ¹⁹sixty-four in every gavael; two hundred and fifty-six in the trev; one thousand and twenty-four in every maenol; twelve thousand two hundred and eighty-⁸eight in the twelve maenols. In the two trevs which pertain to the court there are to be five hundred and twelve erws: the whole of that, when summed up, is twelve thousand and eight hundred erws in the cymwd;
 and the same number in the other cymwd:
 that is, the number of erws in the cantrev is twenty-five thousand and six hundred, neither more nor less.

14. Of the twelve maenols, which are to be in the cymwd, four are assigned to aillts to support dogs and horses, and for progress and ¹'dovraeth;' and one for canghellor-ship; and one other for maership; and the rest for free uchelwrs.

15. And from those ¹eight the king is to have a gwestva every year; that is, a pound yearly from each of them: three-score pence is charged on each trev of the four that are in a maenol, and so subdivided into quarters in succession, until each erw of the tyddyn be assessed: and that is called the tunc pound; and the silentiary is to collect it annually: and a similar payment in full from the other cymwd: and thus the cantrev is complete.

6. Neither maer nor canghellor is to be imposed upon a free maenol, nor progress, nor dovræth, ⁵nor youths, nor anything besides what we have said above; except the ⁶great progress of the household in the winter.

7. The king is not to lead hosts out of the country, except once every year; and then, not to continue more than six weeks. In his own country he is free to have hosts when he will.

8. All are to work on the castles, whenever the king may will it, except the men of the maer-trev.

9. The aillts of the king are not to support him, nor to support his household; and since they are not to support him, they are not to retain their honey nor their fish, but are to send them to the king's court; and he may, if he will, make wears upon their waters, and take their hives.

10. One of the aillts is to be the king's land maer.

11. They are to furnish pack-horses to the king, for the hosts; and they are to present the queen, once every year, with meat and drink; and they are to support the dogs, the huntsmen, the falconers, and the youths, all of them, once every year.

12. And if there be alltuds from another country in the king's realm, either as his men, or waiting a wind, or for other matters; if he will, he is to place them on dovræth upon his aillts according to their abilities.

13. And those alltuds are to show their property to the aillt, when they enter the house; and they are to have it entire, when they leave it. XXII. OF MEER BREACH THIS IS.

1. Whoever shall destroy a meer between two trevs, by ploughing it; the king is to have the eight oxen that ploughed it, and the plough and the irons, and the worth of the ploughman's right foot, and the worth of the driver's left hand; and four-pence to the owner of the land: and the meer to be restored to its former state.

XXIII. OF PLOUGHING LAND SURREPTITIOUSLY.

1. Whoever shall plough land surreptitiously, let him pay four-pence to the owner of the land, and a penny for every furrow that is ploughed; and surreption-fine to the king.

XXIV. OF DEFINING OF MEERS THIS IS.

1. Whoever shall remove a public meer stone between two trevs, let him pay ⁹eleven score' pence to the owner of the land, and a camlwrw to the King; and so for a road, which may preserve a meer with ⁸the side of the' road.

XXVI. THIS IS THE MEASURE OF THE KING'S GWESTVA FROM A FREE MAENOL.

1. The measure of the king's gwestva in winter, from a free maenol: that is to say, a horse-load of the best flour that shall grow on the land; ¹⁰the carcass of a cow or an ox; a full vat of mead, nine hand-breadths in its length diagonally, and as much ²⁰again in breadth; and seven thraves of oats, of one band, for provender; a three year old swine; a salted flitch of three finger-breadths in thickness; and a vessel of butter, three hand-breadths in depth, not heaped, and three in breadth; and if these cannot be obtained, a pound is to be paid in lieu of them; and that is the tunc pound; and twenty-four pence to the king's servants. If that quantity of mead cannot be obtained, two of bragot; if bragot be not obtained, then four of ale. And that shall come to the king from every free maenol.

2. The manner in which that pound shall be shared is, six score for bread; three score for liquor; and three score for enllŷn.

XXVII. FROM BOND MAENOLS THE AMOUNT DUE IS AS FOLLOWS.

1. From the bond maenols two ⁵⁰'dawn-bwyds' are due yearly.

2. The winter: a three year old swine; a vessel of butter, three hand-breadths in depth, and three in breadth; a full vat of 'bragot, nine hand-breadths in length diagonally; a thrave of ⁴'oats, of one band, for provender; ⁶¹twenty-six loaves of the best bread that shall grow on the land; if it be wheat land, six of them of fine flour; if it be not wheat land, six of them of groats; four of them for the hall, and two for the

XXVIII. OF THE FETUS OF A WOMAN, IF INJURED, THIS TREATS.

1. Some are doubtful with respect to the foetus of a woman, if injured, as to what is due for it; whether gwyneb-werth or galanas. The law says, that galanas is due for it; and for this cause: during the first three months, it is white, and then the third of a galanas is to be on it; during the second three months, it is ruddy, and then two parts of a galanas are to be on it; and, during the last three months, it is perfect in its members and life, and then a full galanas is to be on it.

2. Some say, that it is not more right to pay the galanas of a man than that of a woman for it, since it is not known what it is, whether male, or female; the law says, that it is most right to decide from the higher subject, and that the galanas of a man is to be on it; and that until it be baptized; and this is the cause: every

4. At the end of seven years, he himself is to 'swear for his acts, and his father is to pay; for then he shall come under the hand of his confessor, and shall take 'duties upon himself.

5. From the time when a boy is born, until he shall be fourteen years of age, he is to be at his father's platter, and his father lord over him, and he is to receive no punishment but that of his father; and he is not to possess one penny of his property during that time, only in common with his father; and no 'marw-dy' accrues by his dying within that period; for his father owns all his property which may be in his 'custody; since his father during that time is to be responsible for him for every thing.

6. If the father die in the first year after the boy is born, he succeeds to the privilege of his father.

7. No ebediw is to be paid for a boy under fourteen years of age, his father being alive: after he succeeds to the privilege of his father, he shall pay it.

8. At the end of the fourteen years, the father is to bring his son to the lord, and commend him to his charge; and then the youth is to become his man, and to be on the privilege of his lord: and he is himself to answer to every claim that may be made on him; and is to possess his own property: thenceforward his father is not to correct him, more than a stranger; and, if he should correct him, upon complaint made by the son against him, he is subject to dirwy, and is to do him right for the saraad.

9. If the son die after fourteen years of age, and leave no heir; his lord is to possess all his property, and to be in the place of a son to him, and his house becomes a marw-dy. ¹¹Others say, that there is no marw-dy, but that of a person who dies of sudden death, without an heir, and without being able to bequeath the property. From that age onward, he is of the same privilege with an innate boneddig; for he has no privilege, excepting his descent, as he ascends not to the privilege of his father until his father's death: and no one is a "marchog" until he shall "ascend.

XXIX. OF THE WORTH OF AN INNATE BONEDDIG THIS IS.

1. The worth of an innate boneddig is three score and three kine.

2. His saraad is three kine, and three score of silver.

3. If he have a family, his worth is four score and four kine.

4. His saraad is four kine, and four score of silver.

XXX. OF THE LAW OF A DAUGHTER AND HER RIGHTS THIS IS.

1. From the time a girl is baptized, until she shall attain the age of seven years, she is not to be put to her oath.

2. From the time of her birth, until she be twelve years of age, she is to be at her father's platter.

3. From her twelfth year onward, mam-mæ et crines et menses apparebunt; and then she is become of age to be given to a husband: and, from that time forward, if she have not had a husband, she is to possess her own property, and is not to remain at her father's platter, unless he shall will it: and the father is not to pay amobyr for his daughter, unless he himself gave her away; because every giver of a woman is to pay ⁵³deliver ⁵⁴and a ⁵⁵she ⁵⁶if he shall be the giver of her, let him take sureties from the person who shall take her.

her amobyr; 'or else receive satisfaction from the woman that is given to a man.'

4. If a man take away a woman clandestinely from her father's house to another house, and there sleep with her; the owner of that house is to pay the amobyr: unless he take surety from the man, who brought her away clandestinely, for paying it.

5. In her twelfth year a woman ought to menstruate, as we have said above; and from her twelfth unto her fourteenth year, she ought to continue without pregnancy; from her fourteenth year unto her fortieth year she ought to bear children; and, from that time forward, she is not liable to galanas; and she is not to be put to her oath that she shall not have any more children; for it is certain that she never will.

XXXI. OF DENYING AND RECEIVING A SON THIS IS.

1. Whoever may will to deny a son lawfully, is not required so to do, unless he be first lawfully affiliated to him; since it is not necessary to answer a nullity: for every thing is a nullity that is not lawful.

2. Whatsoever woman intend lawfully to affiliate a child, thus it is right for her to do: to come with the child to the church wherein her burying place is, and approach the altar, and place her right hand upon the altar and the relics, and her left hand upon the head of the child, and so swear, to God first, and by that altar, and by the sacred relics thereon, and by the baptism of the child, that no father has formed in the womb of its mother this present child, but such and such a man, naming him, in her womb. In this manner is a child to be affiliated to a Cymro.

3. And thus is a child to be affiliated to an alltud: to come to the church in which he shall take the holy water and the sacramental bread, and there affiliate it to him, like as it has been said above. And then it is right for the father to do one of two things ; either to receive the child lawfully, or else to deny him lawfully.

4. If he will to deny him, it is right for him to come to the church we have already mentioned, and there place his right hand upon the altar and the relics thereon, and his left hand upon the head of the boy, and so swear, to God first, and by that altar, and by the sacred relics upon it, and by the Being who formed him by the agency of father and mother, that he never procreated that child in the womb of that woman, and that there is not one drop of his blood in him, except from Adam.

5. If he seek for time 'for his oath,' he is not to have it, 'except until the morrow.'

6. If the woman seek time to fetch relics, she is to be allowed only three days ; for she is not to seek relics except in that cymwd.

7. If a father deny a child to be of his kindred, after he has been affiliated to him ; such child can never after, by law, obtain a father.
The cause is, that his mother has lawfully affiliated him to a father, who also has lawfully denied him ; and therefore, she can never affiliate him a second time to another father ; and he cannot revert to the father who has already denied him lawfully : for,
the law will not do again what it has done.

8. That boy shall then rank, as to his privilege, with the kindred of his mother :
and, if he kill a person, the kindred of his mother must pay two parts of the galanas, and the third be on himself, as a homicide ; and, if he be killed, his mother's kindred are to have two parts of his galanas.
And that is called one of the three severe losses of a kindred.

9. Another is, if a man kill another man, with sureties from the kindred of the mur-derer for the galanas, and before the kindred shall have paid the galanas, the mother of the murderer affiliates him to a distinct father; the law says, that the kindred that gave surety for the payment of the galanas are bound to pay it, for two causes: his committing the crime whilst he remained on their privilege; and because they are bound to pay who have given surety.

10. The third is, if a Welsh female be given to an alltud, and she should have a son by the alltud, and that son kill a person; two parts of the galanas come upon the kindred of his mother; and one third on the murderer; and that because there is no kindred of the father to pay it. And that is called cattle surety; because cattle are given as sureties: for with cattle every payment was formerly made.

11. The two sons, whom we have spoken of above, have the same privilege, the same saraad, and are of the same worth, as an innate boneddig, if their mother be a Welshwoman; if their mother be an alltud, they are also alltuds.

12. There is a son by declaration, and a son by sufferance. A son by declaration is a son whom the mother affirms, orally, to be the offspring of a man, but without bringing it to the test: ⁶⁰such is called a son by declaration, and may be denied at any time.

13. A son by sufferance is a son whom a woman lawfully affiliates to a man, and is suffered by the man to remain a year and a day undenied; from thenceforward, he cannot, ⁶¹in a strait, ever deny him. And if that son commit a crime, ⁶²before the end of the year, after he is affiliated, he cannot be denied in the strait, since he was not denied openly, ⁶³until the crime shall be redressed, as being a son by sufferance.

14. Though ⁶⁴there might be privilege belonging to the father of the son of a female alltud; yet by his being denied by the father, that son is an alltud thenceforward.

15. Though it might be that an alltud should will to deny the son of a Welshwoman; upon denial the son becomes an innate boneddig thenceforward : for every son, after being denied, ranks according to the privilege of his mother.

16. A father may deny his son 'by sufferance,' on the morrow after he has made amends for his crime, if so minded, until the end of the year after he is affiliated to him.'

17. If a father give property for rearing a son, he is not to deny him thenceforward : for, one of the three acknowledgments of a child is giving property for his rearing.

18. If the father die, the chief of the kindred may deny him, with six of his kindred, in the same manner as the father might deny him, if living, and in the same church, having seven of the best men of his kindred to swear that his oath is pure.

19. If there be not a chief of the kindred, 'twenty-one' of the best men of his kindred are to deny him.

20. According to the law of the men of Powys, fifty men are to deny a son to be of the kindred.

21. No one, into whose hand the land of the son would fall, can deny him, to oust him therefrom : and a brother cannot deny another, lest he deny him for his erw of it : and, if there be no brother, a first cousin cannot deny another, for 'his erw : ' and no one to whom his land would fall is to deny him, lest he deny him 'for his erw of it : ' and, if there be no first cousins, a second cousin cannot deny another, lest he deny him for 'the property : ' and no one is to deny another, who might succeed to the property in consequence of such denial.

22. If there be some of the kindred of a son denying him, and others receiving him, it is most right to believe those receiving him, if they swear, that it is not for reward nor for worth, that they receive him : because it is most common to deny a son for his patrimony.

23. Every brother may deny a sister, except in one case ; that is, when the property of the mother, or of the father, is to be shared; if, on account of her share of the property, he attempt to deny her, to prevent sharing the property of the mother and father with her, it cannot be done.

24. In like manner, every alltud may denyh is brother, or his sister, if he will; except on account of sharing in the property of their father, or of their mother, or making amends for ¹³their crime.

25. Thus a son is to be received as of kin:
 the father himself may receive him, after he is lawfully affiliated to him by his mother:
 if the father be not alive, the chief of the kindred, with six, may receive him, and those of the best men of his kindred; and, thus he is to be received: the chief of the kindred is to take the hands of the child between his own hands, and give him a kiss; for a kiss is a sign of affinity; and then to place the right hand of the child in the hand of the oldest of the other men, who is also to give him a kiss; and so from hand to hand unto the last man. If there be no chief of the kindred "twenty-one" of the best men of the kindred; and the ⁶man who shall be in the place of the lord, is to take the boy by his right hand, and put it into the hand of the oldest of those men, who is to give him a kiss; and that man is to take the child in his right hand, and give him into the hand of the next in seniority, who is also to give him a kiss; and so from hand to hand unto the last man.

26. According to the men of Powys, ⁶¹if there be neither father nor chief of the kindred, fifty men are to receive, and deny a child.

 country.]

Howel the good, son of Cadell, prince of Cymru, summoned to him six men from every cantrev in all Cymru, to the White House on the Tav, in Dyved, and those of the wisest men in his dominion ; four of them laics, and two clerks. The cause for bringing the clerks was, lest the laics should introduce what might be contrary to the holy scripture. And the time of their assembling there was the six weeks of Lent ; and the cause for their coming there in Lent was, that no one ought to speak or to do wrong at that time of purity.

And then they examined the laws : such of them as might be too severe in punishment, to mitigate ; and such as might be too lenient, to render more rigorous : some of the laws they suffered to remain unaltered ; others they willed to amend ; others they abrogated entirely ; and they enacted some new laws.

And then Howel the good and those wise men denounced their malediction upon such as should pervert those laws ; and upon the lord who should change any one of them, except with the consent of an assembly as large as that which met there. Another malediction they denounced upon the lord who should confer, and upon the person who should undertake judicial authority, without knowing the three columns of law ; and the worth of wild and tame animals, and whatever pertains to them.

And after they had constituted the laws as they considered to be fitting, Howel the good, and the bishop of Menevia, the bishop of Asaph, and the bishop of Bangor, together with others, making thirteen in number, of teachers and of other wise men, of the laity, went to Rome to obtain the authority of the pope of Rome for the laws of Howel. And there were read the laws of Howel in the presence of the pope of Rome, and the pope was satisfied with them, and gave

THE LAW OF THE FUNCTIONS OF A JUDGE.

Whosoever may will to undertake judiciary functions, it is right for him to understand this book, so that it may be fitting for him to accept judicial functions; and when his teacher shall find him to be competent, let him commend him to the judge of the court; and the judge of the court is to prove him, and if he find him competent is to recommend him to the lord; and the lord is to invest him with judicial functions; and thenceforth his decisions are to be of authority: and he is to pay twenty-four pence to the judge of the court as his fee. If, from thenceforth, he should pronounce an unjust sentence, he is not entitled to his tongue, unless he redeem it for its worth in law. Should a party enter into a mutual pledge with him, and he be found in the right, he is to have gwynebwarth from the person who shall have so mutually pledged with him; and a camlvrv to the lord. A judge is not to receive a pledge after quitting his judgment seat, unless he himself will it: and he is not to receive one from a laic, unless promising a more correct decision by another judge, than that pronounced by him.

10. The ninth is, to see the person murdered in his presence, without rescuing him.

For each of those three, if denied, the oaths of three hundred men are required: or thrice nine score of silver, if acknowledged.

11. ¹¹Some say, that the kindred are to have that money, together with the denial; because those accessories being the cause of the murder of their relation, they are to have that money; and to deny blood and wound and killing of their relation, they are to have the raith which we have mentioned above: the law, however, says, that no one is to have both the denial and the money; and that they are not to have that denial and the money; since the kindred are only to have the saraad and galanas of their relation; and that in such instance there is neither assault, nor battery, nor blood, nor wound, nor loss of life; and where such do not occur, there is neither saraad nor galanas; and therefore the kindred are to have nothing from the accessories aforesaid. It is wrong to commit those accessories aforesaid, and therefore the lord is to have a camlwrw for them, according to the degree of the accessories; one singly, another two-fold, another three-fold, since no fighting took place there; and, if there had been fighting, there would have been a dirwy to the lord. The amount of a dirwy is three pounds, or twelve kine: the amount of a camlwrw is three kine, or nine score of silver.

12. Whoever is a murderer, the full galanas falls upon him. And thus the galanas is to be shared: one third upon the murderer, and upon his father and mother, if they be living; and of that, two parts upon himself, and the third upon his father and mother; and of the third which falls upon the parents, two pence upon the father, and one upon the mother.

If the murderer have children, and they be of age liable to pay, he is to pay as much accessory, one three-fold, another two-fold, another singly. A dirwy is not due for being accessory to galanas, only a camlwrw.

12. A dirwy is due for fighting: fighting is assault and battery, and blood, and wound, the three things that constitute fighting; and therefore it is right to pay dirwy for them. The amount of the dirwy is, twelve kine, or three pounds: the amount of a camlwrw is, three kine, or nine score pence.

13. There are three dirwy pennies: the dirwy of theft; the dirwy of violence; and the dirwy of fighting: and, except those, every other unlawful act a man shall do is a camlwrw; and for every camlwrw let what we have said above be done.

14. Whosoever shall have murder charged upon him for galanas, let the kindred pursue him; and first the lord, on the day on which his man is killed, or he shall hear of his being killed: what he can get of his spoil, or of that of the kindred, is to be without question to the lord; if he get no spoil, then full galanas ensues.

as two of them ; two pence upon the bro-that fall upon his kindred, the third upon the kindred of the murderer's mother, and the two parts upon the kindred of his father ; and so the galanas proceeds from maternity to maternity unto the seventh descent, or the seventh maternity : for the children of the first mother are brothers ; and the children of the grandmother are first cousins ; and the children of the great-grandmother, are second cousins ; and the children of the mother in the fourth degree, are third cousins ; and the children of the mother in the fifth degree, are fourth cousins ; and the children of the mother in the sixth degree, are fifth cousins ; and the children of the mother in the seventh degree, are sixth cousins ; and galanas goes no further than that. Though only two or three of the degrees should be ascertained, let the galanas be cast upon them ; and that which falls not upon them, is to be shared upon the families from whom the father is descended, rating two shares upon the stock.

16. Galanas is to be thus imposed : the first third on the murderer, and the mother, and the father, and the brothers, and the sisters, with him ; for those persons would receive with him a third of the galanas if paid to them, therefore let them so pay with him. They shall thus share it in three thirds : a third on the mother and father ; and a third on the brothers and sisters ; and a third on the murderer : if the murderer be dead, let those persons pay the third of the galanas in full. Of the third of the brothers and sisters ; two pence on the brother, and one on the sister ; of the third which falls on the father and the mother ; two pence on the father, and one on the mother. If all those persons we have mentioned above be dead ; the murderer himself shall pay it : if some be dead, and others alive, let them proportionally pay that third ; so that none of that third fall short of what ought to be paid to the kindred whose due it is, and to the lord.

and that goes to assist the murderer. The manner it is exacted is, the murderer is to take a servant of the lord, carrying with him a relic; and wherever he shall meet with a person beyond the seventh degree of kindred, let such person take his oath, that he is not descended from any of the four kindreds from which the other is descended; and unless he take that oath, let him pay a spear penny; and if he take the oath, he is to be exempted.

14. A woman does not pay a spear penny, for she has not a spear, but her distaff only; neither do clerks pay it: and a woman does not pay galanas, if she make oath that she shall have no children; neither do clerks pay it: and it is not paid by a boy under fourteen years of age.

15. The law of galanas.

Thus the galanas fine is to be exacted: the first third to the lord for exacting it; and the second third to the father and mother and their children; out of that, two shares to the father, and one to the mo-

with to pay, it is right to give him a spear penny to assist him; and that shall be paid to him from the seventh man onwards: those seven men are, brother, first cousin, second cousin, third cousin, fourth cousin, fifth cousin, and a kinsman the son of a fifth cousin; and since relationship can be no further counted, let them, beyond that, pay to him a spear penny. And the manner he shall collect a spear penny from the men he may find of his kindred, when he may not know how to trace his relationship to them is, to take a relic he may credit, and when he shall meet with one of those men, let him take his oath that he does not originate from his kindred, or pay him a spear penny; and unless he pay, let the servants of the lord be with him, to take a pledge from his hand, or a surety. And that penny shall not be paid by a female, whether old or young; for a female has no spear, only her distaff; and therefore it is not paid by a distaff: and clerks likewise do not pay it.

18. If he shall not be able, either by spear penny, or with his own goods, to pay in full; though only one penny be wanting, and he be killed by his enemies on account of that penny, they commit no illegal act:

ther: ²⁶and of that which shall come to the father and the mother, two pence to the father, and one to the mother: and of what remains for the children, if there be children of the murdered man, two shares²⁷ to them. ²⁸And the two parts which go to the kindred are to be divided into three shares; and of that one third to the kindred of the mother, and the two parts to the kindred of the father. And so galanas is shared, and received, from third to third: and so the thirds are received, in every one of the trials, between the lord and the kindred. The eldest son is to point out the offspring of his father, and his family; and attend the servants of the lord in collecting the galanas.

16. The period for galanas is a fortnight, after being summoned, for each lordship wherein they live, to apportion the payment; and twice that time for exacting the payment, and to assemble them to pay it. ¹⁵And every lord is to have the exacting third in his own lordship. At three periods, and in three thirds, the galanas is to be paid; two periods for the kindred of the father, and one for the kindred of the mother; because two thirds fall upon the kin-for part is not the whole. And if killed; neither the goods mentioned above, nor himself, shall be compensated to his kindred: on which account the law styles what we have mentioned above, the sad fall of galanas.

19. No one is to be killed on account of another but a murderer; neither for a share of galanas, nor any thing else; for if the kindred disown the murderer, there is no claim upon them, nor are they, unless the lord exact it, to pay; and therefore the exacting third is for the lord; and females and clerks shall pay it, unless they deny that they shall ever have children, for they shall pay for their children: and those are the persons who pay galanas but do not receive it.

20. And two parts fall on the kindred, and that shall be shared into three thirds; and of that, two parts on the kindred of the father, and the third on the kindred of the mother: and let the elders of the kindreds so take it, and impose a third on maternity, and two parts on paternity: of that which shall remain on the family, and not upon the kindreds, let two pence be imposed on the brother, and one

dred of the father; ¹and therefore they are to have two periods.' At the first period for the kindred of the father to pay one of their thirds, they are to have the oaths of one hundred of the best men of the other kindred, that their relation is forgiven; and at the second period, on their paying their second third, they are also to have the oaths of another hundred men of the other kindred, that their relation is forgiven; ²and those of the best men of the tribe; ³and at the third period, the kindred of the mother are to pay their third; and then they are to have the oaths of a hundred men of the other kindred, that their relation is forgiven: and everlasting concord is to be established on that day, and perpetual amnesty between them.

17. The oaths of three hundred men ⁴of a kindred' are required to deny murder, blood, and wound, and the killing of a person; and therefore it is right to give the oaths of three hundred men to ⁵release him; and for amnesty between the kindreds, the raith we have mentioned above.

upon the sister; and so galanas proceeds from third to third to the kinsman the son of a fifth cousin: and there the father pays the galanas, and the son does not; because the relationship of the son to the murderer cannot be fixed, although the relationship of the father to him can. And if the murderer pay his share, he is not to be killed, although the kindred may not have paid their share: and so the kindred are not to be compelled, although he may not have paid.

21. Should a lord and a kindred exact galanas, and the other kindred ask for time in law; the law says they are to have a fortnight's time for each lordship the kindred may be in; to collect the kindreds together to answer, and adjust the galanas.

22. No one is killed without being first subjected to saraad; and that saraad is not to be augmented to him: if he be married, let a third of the man's saraad be given to the wife; and let the two shares be placed with the galanas, and after that, let the galanas be shared into three shares, and let the third share go to the lord as exacting third; and let the two parts be again shared into three thirds, and one of those thirds to

18. To deny the killing of a person with savage violence, the oaths of six hundred men are required; for the galanas and its penance being double, so the denial also is to be double.

19. When a person is killed, saraad is done to him in the first instance, and that saraad does not augment; and, therefore, it is right to pay that saraad before the galanas; and if the man have a wife, let the third of the saraad be given to her, and the two parts be shared among the brothers, the cousins, and the second cousins; and if his father be alive, he is to have as much as two of the brothers; and if his mother be alive, she is to have as much as two sisters: and that is the best form; for they are the several persons who are to pay saraad with him, if he were to do saraad to another. Others say, that after one third is given to the wife, the other two parts are to be mixed with the galanas, and shared among the kindred.

20. The lord is to have the exacting third of the saraads, as of the galanas.

the parents, that is the father and mother, and brothers and sisters, if there be any. The women and the clerks are not to have a share of the galanas; their children, however, if they have any, are to share. Let the two parts again be shared into three thirds, and let a third of that two parts go to the kindred of the mother; and after that let the elders of the kindreds share in thirds the third of the maternity, and the two parts of the paternity; and that which remains among them let them apportion it as they may see right among themselves until the seventh man.

23. Thus dispersed galanas shall be shared.

Should an innate boneddig of Powŷs be in Gwynedd, or one from Gwynedd be in Powŷs, and become subject to galanas, and his family kindred should not be in the country with him, although many relatives should; it is right for him to pay galanas, and to bring these along with him: and that shall not be shared according to maternity nor paternity, but according to the number of his kindred that may be in the country. That shall be shared in thirds; a third first on himself, and his children if he have any, and his father and mother if such there be; and the two parts shall be shared on the kin-

21. Neither clerks nor women are to have a share of the galanas, since they are not avengers: however, they are to pay for their children; or make an oath that they shall never have any.

22. Some of the judges suffer the mother, father, brothers, sisters, and their offspring, to pay, with the murderer; for those persons would obtain one third of his galanas, if he were killed; so they likewise are to pay one third of galanas with him; and of that the murderer is to pay twice as much as the father; and the father is to pay twice as much as the son; and the mother is to pay as much as her son; and the brother pays as much as his two sisters; and of the murderer's proportion, the murderer himself is to pay as much as two of his sons. And that is the law of Howel.

dred; as much on the brother as on the two first cousins; and as much on the sister as on the two second cousins; and so it shall be shared until the seventh man: and spear penny does not go by this reckoning.

24. Thus we treat of the saraads.

First, of the saraad of the king of Aberfraw. The law investigated what was saraad to him, and to every body; and the law saw that nothing was saraad to any body but one of three especial things: to disgrace him on account of his wife; or kill his messenger; or break his protection. The compensation to him on account of his wife [is, a gold cup with] a gold cover to it, as broad as his face, and as thick as the nail of a ploughman, who has been a ploughman for nine years; and a golden rod as tall as himself, and as thick as his little finger; and a hundred kine for each cantref in his possession, with a white bull with red ears to each hundred kine; and if they should be black cattle, a black bull with each hundred kine; and that augmented by one half: the other two saraads, we have above mentioned, are not to be augmented, only compensated. If a person from another country should commit the saraad, the compensation is three score and three pounds: and that is his own royal tribute to the king of London, when he shall receive his land from him; and be-

24. The galanas of the king of Aberfraw is his saraad threefold.

25. The galanas of the king's wife, his son, his edling, his nephew, and his chief of the household, is one third of the king's galanas : and their saraad is one third of the king's saraad.

26. The galanas of the king's daughter is half the galanas of her brother : and her saraad is in the same proportion, before she marries.

27. The galanas of a steward, ¹⁰a chief of a kindred', a canghellor, ¹²and a chief huntsman', is nine score and nine kine, once augmented : and their saraad is nine kine, and nine score of silver ¹⁸once augmented.

sides that nothing else is due, with the exception of dogs, and hawks, and horses.

25. In three ways saraad is done to the queen : by breaking her protection ; or striking her ; or snatching any thing from her hand : a third of the compensation to the king, except gold, shall be paid to her. And similar to her's is the saraad of the chief of the household, the edling, and the king's son ; a third of the king's saraad is the saraad of each of these. His saraad three times is his worth : and the worth of each of those persons we have mentioned above is similarly estimated.

26. The saraad of the king's daughter is half the saraad of her brother until she shall marry ; after marriage her saraad is a third of her husband's saraad : and in like manner every female's.

27. In three ways saraad occurs to every person in the world : by striking ; assaulting ; and taking by violence from him : and if it be a man, if his wife be violated, it is saraad to him : if it be a woman, if she find another woman with her husband, it is saraad to her : and so nobody escapes without being subject to saraad.

28. The saraad of the steward, the chief of kindred, and the canghellor ; nine kine and nine score of silver. Their worth is nine score and nine kine, augmented.

29. The worth of an uchelwr, and of every man that has an office from his lord ; six score and six kine, augmented. Their saraad is six kine, and six score of silver.

31. The galanas of an innate boneddig, and of the king's alltud, is three score and three kine: their saraad is three kine, and three score of silver.

32. ¹²The galanas of the alltud of an uchelwr, is half the galanas of the king's alltud: and his saraad in the same proportion.'

33. The ¹⁴worth of a bondman, if of this island, is one pound; if from beyond sea, one pound and six score pence. The saraad of a bondman is twelve pence: six for a

34. Whoever shall confess the commission of saraad to any one of those we have mentioned above; let there be paid to him the saraad we have mentioned.

35. Whoever shall deny saraad, it is right for him to deny three points; that he caused neither disgrace nor saraad to him, nor to his kindred, nor to his lord: it is denied as to the lord, to obviate dirwy to the lord; and to obviate paying him his saraad; and to obviate the revenge of the kindred. Why is it denied as to the kindred, and the kindred receive none of the saraad that shall be paid him? Because when saraad is done to their relative, it is disgrace to them, and it is lawful for them to revenge their disgrace; and therefore it is right to deny the commission of saraad to their relative: if saraad be paid to him it is disgrace-repara-

II. OF THE NINE ACCESSORIES OF THEFT THIS TREATS.

1. Of the nine accessories of theft.
2. The first of them is, to point out the thing to be stolen.
3. The second is, to consent to the theft.
4. The third is, to give provision to the thief.
5. The fourth is, to go in his society and carry the provision.
6. The fifth is, to accompany him, and to break into the place whence the property is to be stolen.
7. The sixth is, to be an "adviser" to the thief, and a receiver of the stolen property.
8. The seventh is, to travel, by day or night, along with the thief.
9. The eighth is, to receive a share of the stolen property.
10. The ninth is, to receive worth from the thief for secrecy.
11. For each of those accessories, a dirwy is to be imposed, if acknowledged, ³⁰having been previously concealed: the amount of the dirwy is twelve kine, or three pounds, to be paid to the lord: they are not to pay anything to the owner of the property, as they are not murderers. If they cannot pay the dirwy, the lord may banish them on account of it: he may, however, receive three pence in lieu of the three pounds, if he will, without infringing the law. If they be able to tion to the kindred: and where there is no disgrace there is no claim.

36. The saraad of a single woman before marriage is a half of her brother's saraad.

37. The saraad of every woman after marriage is a third of her last known husband's saraad.

38. The galanas of every female shall always be to the kindred.

obtain the payment, they are not to be exiled, ²nor their property confiscated ; ³nor to be executed.

12. If any of the accessories, which we have mentioned above, be denied, their denial is the same as the denial of ⁴a murderer. ⁵Others say, in respect to that raiŷh, that five men, without alltuds, without nod-men, shall deny it: and that is correctly the law of Howel.

13. Thus theft is to be denied in the law of Howel: the oaths of twelve men, for a horse, ⁶or three score of silver; for that is the lowest value of a horse, in law: the half nod-men, and the other half not nod-men; and two parts of them are to be of kin to the father, and one third of kin to the mother, and their relationship so near to the accused, as to pay or to receive his galanas.

14. To deny ²³a horse-load, or ²⁴an ox, ²⁵for a horse may carry an ox; ²⁶the oaths of six men, and himself the seventh, and the half to be nod-men.

15. To deny a swine, or a sheep, ³⁰or a back-burthen; the oaths of five men, the half nod-men, the other half not nod-men, and himself the fifth; and then the raiŷh is to be equally taken from the two kindreds; since there cannot be a third of four persons.

16. ⁴⁰Those raiŷhs are not ⁴¹required except to rebut a legal prosecution: a legal prosecution is the oath of the owner, that the person in question really stole the goods; for there cannot be a prosecution, except by the owner.

17. Though the owner of goods should say, orally, that a person has stolen them; yet if he bring it not to the test, we decide that the oath of the defendant alone is required to deny it.

18. Though a person who is not the owner ⁵⁶of the relics ⁵⁷prosecute another for theft; the oath of the defendant alone is sufficient to clear him : because no one but the owner is to prosecute for theft.

19. ²At present it is customary to require for every theft, whether great or small, the oaths of twelve men ; and the half of them nod-men.'

20. Though the raith of a person, concerned as an accessory, fail ; he shall only be liable to dirwy ; unless it be minded to prosecute him for perjury.

21. Of a raith.

Though the raith for a criminal fail, whatever the amount of the theft he shall be accused of, he is not to be executed if he pay seven pounds ; and if he cannot pay, he is not to be executed, only exiled : for no one is to be put to death, upon whom nothing is found. Others say, that he is to lose his life, unless he obtain his worth.

22. Whoever is exiled by the sentence of the law, is to set out on his departure the following morning ; and, from that time forward, a day is allowed for passing through each cantrev belonging to the lord who shall exile him : and that is the delay for an exile.

23. Whoever shall catch a thief, with stolen goods in his possession, and let him go, either for relationship or for worth ; if he confess, let him pay seven pounds ; for, though the thief forfeit his life, he does not : if he be unable to pay seven pounds, let him be banished as a thief.

24. Whoever is exiled by the sentence of the law, and is found in the country, beyond the time assigned for remaining in the country ; let him lose his life, unless he find some one to buy him ; for he is not to return to the country during the life of the lord who exiled him, unless by being pardoned.

25. The law concerning theft.

Any person soever, to whose house the track of ³⁴a thief leads, and he shall be unable legally to ³⁵trace it further ; let his property be confiscated ; and if he have no property, let him be exiled.

26. Any person soever, in whose house, ³⁸or in the purlieus of the house, wherein he is resident, stolen goods shall be found ; though he may not be personally concerned in the theft ; he ought nevertheless to prevent his house being a receptacle for the theft : and therefore we judge that house, with all in it, a deposit excepted, to be a 'halog-dy ;' for the owner of the deposit is not to guard another house from receiving theft, therefore he is not to lose his property.

27. There is in the law but one case wherein harrŷing confiscation occurs ; and that case is, for homicide.

28. Whoever may will to make a full information, let him go to the lord and say, that a person, whom he dare not mention, either on account of his rank, or of his property, has committed a theft : then it is right for the lord to summon the priest to him, and state to him what had been imparted to him ; and send the priest along with the informant to the church door, and let him charge him to beware of being guilty of perjury. Then, if he willeth to swear, let him swear first at the church door ; secondly, in the chancel ; and thirdly, at the altar. And from thence, let the priest return to the lord, and say, that he has had the whole ; and the lord is to swear to having had full information, when he shall examine the person, in the courts ; and against this nothing can be done. Still, he is not to lose his life 'for that,' but is to be a saleable thief ; and unless he can obtain his worth, let him be exiled as a thief. Other⁸⁸ of the laws allow him a denial against the prosecution by the lord, in the same manner as in a prosecution by the owner : and that form is mostly preferred by the men of Gwynedd.

29. If a person find the flesh of an animal that is not his own, whether killed by dogs, or hidden, and take it away without permission ; a dirwy is payable for it, whether obtained by gift, or endowment, or purchase, even unto the hundredth hand : and therefore it is called the piece of a hundred perplexities : and beyond the hundredth hand it is not cognizable.

to the thing he would detain, and ask : ' Who owns this ?' If there be no one who shall own it, let him have permission to take the property ; and after he shall have obtained permission, let him go to the judge ; and according as the judge shall direct, let him take it, and swear to it.

31. If whilst detaining the property, an owner come and oppose him ; let him ask : ' Who owns this ?' Then it is right for the owner to say, that it is owned by him. And then it is right for the plaintiff to say : ' It is wrong for thee to own what is mine.' And then it is right for the defendant to reply : ' It is altogether denied ; for, nothing of thine have I : and, since I have not ; by what means did thy loss happen, and at what time didst thou lose it ?'

32. It is right to ask and know this, because there are six ways in which a person may lose his property : and in three of those cases he can swear to it ; and in the other three he cannot. The three cases wherein he cannot swear are, a deposit and loan, and hire, and favour ; for it is not right to enquire where these are, or to enquire to whom they are gone. The other three, which it is right to swear to are, first, theft ; the second, loss by negligence ; and the third is, surreption : they are to be sworn to, because they were not received by another hand from his hand ; therefore he can swear to the property, wherever he may see it.

33. Whosoever may will to swear to the property, is to do it in this manner. If he swear to what is inanimate, let him swear to it, with his left hand upon "any part thereof." If it be a living animal, let him swear to it, with his left hand upon the right ear of the animal, and his right hand upon the relics : and let the defendant place his right hand upon the left ear of the animal ; and so let him swear to the 'plaintiff, that there was no owner to it, who ought either to purchase or to sell it, excepting himself, by right; and moreover, that he did not part with it, either by gift, or loan, or deposit, or sell it; but that, either by theft, or surreption, or straying he lost it; naming the day ¹³or night' in the week, and naming the week in the month, and naming the month in the season, and naming the season in the year, when it was missing.

34. There are three arddelws to an animal: birth and rearing; possession before loss; and arwaesav. ¹⁶To inanimate things there are only two: possession before loss; and arwaesav.'

35. If a person seek his arddelw on birth and rearing, let him 'proceed thus': let him have guardians to speak to the mother's being his property, and that the animal was born and bred in his possession, and was not out of his possession since its birth until that day. The guardians to be produced by him are, a neighbour above his hand, and another below his hand; that is, a man above his rank, and another below his rank; and, if he can obtain those, it will be sufficient for him.

36. If he choose his arddelw on possession before loss, let him swear to it, according to the form we have previously mentioned. After he has sworn to it, let him say that the animal was in his possession, either a week, or a month, ⁴³or two,' or a season, ⁴⁴before the other had it; and that he has guardians 'lawfully to prove its being in his possession, whether a week, ⁴⁴or a fortnight,' or a month, or a season, before he lost it: if he can do this, it is sufficient for him.

37. If his arddelw is by arwaesav, let him say: 'Who will arddelw or arwaesav this?' And if one be in the field, let his 'arwaesav take upon himself the theft; and let the other be free. If the arwaesav take it, let the claimant swear to it in his hand; and he is, if so minded, to seek another arwaesav, 'or another lawful arddelw;' or let him fail 'in the cause.'

38. It is not right that there should be a raith, after detention and swearing, only arwaesav, or custody before loss, or birth and rearing.

39. If a theft be found upon a person, and he assert that he is innocent of the theft, but that it was left with him against his will by another person, and so he had it in his hand, and the person say that it was stolen property; it is then right to adjudge him to produce a raith on that account: and this is the single case where a raith is adjudged after detention and swearing. And thus the theft may go from hand to hand, while there shall be found in the field one to own it.

40. 'If he find in the field one who will own it, with an arddelw of an arwaesav in another place, let time be given him to obtain his arwaesav; that is, three days, if in the same cymwd; if in the next cymwd, nine days; a fortnight, if in another country; and so it proceeds to the third hand; and after the third hand, the law admits of no delay: and if the third hand find in the field a person that will own it, it is right to allow it; yet there is to be no delay, but immediate law.

41. Whosoever shall fix his arwaesav upon another, and his arwaesav fail him; let him be himself an acknowledged thief; and that according to the amount of the theft found upon him.

42. By the law of Howel, for theft to the value of four pence, the thief is saleable; and for a greater amount forfeits his life. Others say, that for every four-footed animal ⁴³that is stolen, either a lamb, a kid, or a pig,' the thief forfeits his life: nevertheless, it is safest to restrict it to four-pence.

43. Seven pounds is the worth of a thief who is to be sold.

44. He who forfeits life is not to lose any of his property; because, both reparation and punishment are not to be exacted, only payment of the property to the loser; and he is to pay the loser, because he ought not to leave a claim upon him unsatisfied.

45. In the law of Howel, there was a payment for theft, and a second payment; and then Bleddyn, son of Cynvyn, altered this rule, because it suffices to pay a person for his loss according to his oath. The property of the criminal is to go in the way he may bequeath it, unless he have children; but, if he have children, then he is to bequeath nothing, except his debts, and daered to the church.

46. Concerning ebediw.

The lord is not to have the ebediw of a person he may himself execute: if executed in another country, the lord is to have his ebediw.

47. There is to be no galanas for a thief; neither is there to be feud between two kindreds, on account of his execution.

48. ³⁴The law says, in respect to' ³⁴'gwynwyr' from another country who go thirds with their own lord; that, 'if caught, they are' saleable thieves; and if killed, that galanas is due for them.

49. 'Traitors to a lord, 'ferocious men,' and every person who forfeits his life by the sentence of the law; no galanas is due for them.

50. Ferocious men, if they deny their savage violence, are to make a denial doubly.

56. A bondman is not to be put to death, if his lord will redeem him; and, unless any thing be found in his hand, his lord may exculpate him; and for that cause it is customary ⁷⁰to allow' lords to exculpate their alltud servants.

57. Alltuds from beyond sea, or from another country, and ⁷¹speaking a different language, are not to be put to death, either for victuals or ⁷²'any other thing' during three nights and three days; but they are to indemnify the owner for his property.

58. For a dog, or for a bird, ⁷³or for any thing of that kind, there is neither dirwy, nor forfeiture of life; but camlwrw to the lord, and amends to the owner of the property.

IV. AND OF THE WORTH OF WILD AND TAME ANIMALS THIS TREATS.

1. The first of them is: the foal of a mare is four pence in value, until the end of the fourteenth day after he is foaled.

2. The next day he is twenty-four pence in value: and if he be found in corn, the amends are to be equal to that for his mother; ²³and thus he continues unto the end of the year.'

3. If he attain the age of one year and a day, another twenty-four pence is added, and so he is worth forty-eight pence; and thus he continues until the third year.

4. And then he proceeds to three score pence; and then he is to be broken in, and it is right to prepare him for the use to be made of him, whether as ■ stallion, a palfrey, or a working horse.

5. A stallion in three seasons neither loses his worth nor privilege for grazing out; ⁴⁴and those are, from the middle of April unto the middle of May, and the whole of the month of October; and thence onward, though he may be in a stall only three nights and three days, he is worth a pound.

6. A palfrey is six score pence in value.

7. A runcy or a sumpter-horse is six score pence in value.

8. A working horse, ⁵²that shall draw a car and a harrow, is worth three score pence.

9. Others say, in respect to a colt, that four legal pence is his worth, from the time he is foaled until August: from August to the calends of winter, eight pence: from the calends of winter until the feast of St. Bride, twelve pence: from the feast

4. 'The worth of each gosling is a half-penny, or a sheaf of barley; and that until they lay; and after they lay, each is one legal penny in value: thus a brood-goose is twelve pence in value.'

XIII. OF THE WORTH OF FOWLS.

1. A hen is one penny in value.
2. A cock is two hens in value.
3. Every chicken is a sheaf of oats or a farthing in value, until it shall roost:
4. After that a halfpenny, until it shall lay, or until it shall crow, is its value:
5. And after that, its value is a legal penny.

XIV. [THE WORTH OF DOGS.]

1. The worth of the king's buck-hound is one pound, when trained:
2. Six score pence, untrained:
3. Three score pence, when a year old:
4. Thirty pence, when a whelp in the kennel:
5. Fifteen pence, from its birth until it shall open its eyes, is its worth.
6. The worth of the king's greyhound, if trained, six score pence:
7. If untrained, three score pence:
8. When a year old, thirty pence:
9. A whelp in the kennel, fifteen pence:
10. From its birth until it shall open its eyes, seven pence halfpenny.
11. The spaniel of the king, is a pound in value.
12. ³³The spaniel of an uchelwr, a pound.'
13. The spaniel of a free-man, is six score pence in value.
14. The spaniel of an aillt, four pence: the same worth as his cur.
15. The worth of the buck-hound of an uchelwr is the same as that of the king's greyhound.
16. The ⁴¹worth of the greyhound of an uchelwr is equal to half the worth of the king's greyhound.

⁴⁴The worth of each gosling is a half-penny, or a sheaf of barley; and that is the worth, until the goose lay, and the gander tread; and after that one penny: and the brood-goose at that time is eight-pence in value.

5. If the oxen be put in the yoke, and one of them die, by whatever disorder he may be taken off; it is right that he should have his erw.

6. Should the owner doubt, "that the ox may not have received injury" from him, let him be sworn, that the injury did not originate with him, either as to its food or its service: and that is called the erw of the black ox.

7. Though co-tillage be formed with an ox; if it come not to the labour, is not yoked, and shall not 'do a turn or two; nothing is to be had on its account.

8. If an ox become ill, whether from a 'wound, or any other thing; it is right for its owner to support the yoke.

9. If a person will to sell an ox out of the co-tillage in which it is put, he is not to sell it until the co-tillage be ended, nor to exchange it; and if he 'separate it but one day, before he has obtained his erw, he loses his erw; and, if after obtaining his erw, he is to support the yoke.

10. Every one is to bring his requisites to the ploughing, whether ox, or irons, or other things pertaining to him; and, after every thing is brought to them, the ploughman and the driver are to keep the whole safely, and use them as well as they would their own.

11. The driver is to yoke in the oxen carefully, so that they be not too tight, nor too loose; and drive them so as not to break their hearts; and if damage happen to them on that occasion, he is to make it good; or else swear that he 'used them not worse than his own.'

12. The ploughman is not to / pay for the oxen, unless they be bruised by him; and if he bruise either one or the whole, let him pay, or exonerate himself. The ploughman is to assist the driver in yoking the oxen; but he is to loosen only the two short-yoked.

13. After the co-tillage shall be completed, every one is to take his requisites with him home.

14. Neither a cleanser, nor a horse for harrowing, is comprised by law in co-tillage.

15. No one is to place a restraint upon the ox of another without his leave; unless there be an agreement, ³⁰or assent.

16. If there should be a dispute about 'bad tillage,' between two co-tillers; let the erw of the ploughman be examined, as to the depth, ³⁰length, and breadth of the furrow, and let every one's be completed alike.

17. If a dispute arise between two co-tillers, as to rough ³⁹bushy land, and to other clear; the one willing to plough the bushy land, and the other not willing; unless there be an agreement to the contrary, it is right for him to plough for the other such land as he may have.

18. If a dispute arise about ploughing, between two co-tillers, one willing to plough far off, and the other near; we say, that they are to go to such place only as that the oxen may reach their stalls, and their work, the weak as well as the strong, within their own cymwd.

19. We say, that an ox engaged in co-tillage is not to be bequeathed, without the consent of the co-tillers; since any one is to bequeath only that which he shall have in possession; and that ox is not then in his possession, ⁶⁶while engaged in the co-tillage.

20. We say, that oxen engaged in co-tillage are neither to be pledged, nor to be distrained; since no one is to pledge but what is in his possession; and that is not.

the corn; but one is not to be taken of two swine, for the swine could not return to the owner of the swine, if 'it remained so.' Then it was altered to one of every fifteen of the pigs; and one of every thirty sheep; and from the goats, the poultry, and the geese, one of every thirty, in like manner. If so many of the swine should not be found upon the corn, according to some¹⁸ of the judges, four pence for every five swine: others say, that a penny is due for each of the swine; and for every 'five animals,' of the sheep and the goats, a penny; and also, of the geese, and the poultry, if the number, for which one is due, be not found upon the corn, an egg is due for each.

9. Poultry are not to be taken upon corn, except during the first fortnight after the corn is sown, before it springs; from that time until it shoot into ear, they are not to be taken; but from the time when the grain is formed, they are.

10. Every crop that a person shall harvest, he is to look after; and the cattle are free: by the crop is understood, corn after it is severed from the land whereon it grew; the produce of an orchard; cabbage; flax, after it is cut, or in a garden uncut; tedded hay; thatch for houses; and their fence; leeks; and every thing that pertains to a garden. Let him fence so strong about his garden, that beasts cannot break into it; and if he do not, and it should be broken into, he is not to be compensated; except for the trespass of poultry and geese; because it is not possible to fence so as to exclude them, since they can fly.

11. The barns are to be open from the time the first sheaf is brought into them, until the calends of winter, to admit the air: and, if the corn be damaged during that period, the owner is to be compensated.

12. From the calends of winter onward, the barns shall be closed in the manner required; they are to be closed by three

13. If a person find an animal upon his corn, and it be disputed whether he found it there; let it be determined by the oath of the taker.

14. If corn be damaged, and the animals be not overtaken upon the corn, let the oath of the owner exonerate them; for there can be no testimony as to an animal; for, if all shall assert that they saw them, it will not avail.

16. If a horse be found stretching his neck over a hedge eating the corn, it is not right to take him, but to obtain compensation for the damage; unless he be exculpated.

17. If either a horse or other animal be found with its two fore-feet upon the corn, it is not to be taken, since it was not wholly upon the corn: and part is not the whole: and, if it be not cleared, the damage is to be compensated.

18. If a person tether his mare by the side of corn, and her colt damage the corn, and cannot be caught; let the mare be taken from the place she is in, and brought to the house; and let the colt be detained in the house, and the mare taken back to her former place: and here the wild is caught by the tame: and that does not constitute an illegal act.

19. Calves, lambs, and kids need not be loosed by the taker, but at his will, between meal-times; for no animal will die, by being impounded from one meal-time to another.

20. The bulls are not to be taken from Midsummer until August, for trespassing upon corn or grass; for at that period the milch cattle become tufty. It is not right to take bulls, from August unto the first feast of the Virgin; for then the heifers become tufty.

21. It is not right to take a bull at any time, that is following a tufty cow.

22. It is not right to take a boar at any time, when following a brimming sow.

23. It is not right to take the rams, nor the he-goats, from the feast of St. Michael unto the calends of winter.

24. Stallions are not to be taken from the middle of April unto the middle of June.

25. A foal following its mother is not to be taken, and that is called a darting foal.

26. Swine are not to be taken for trespassing upon corn, from the feast of St. John unto the calends of January; unless they be found in a barn, or in a meadow.

27. Whoever shall will to preserve a meadow, let him keep it, from the feast of St. Patrick unto the calends of winter: a meadow is land appropriated for hay only, and enclosed by a fence. It is to be preserved unto the calends of winter, because it is mowed twice in the year.

28. Whoever shall find an animal trespassing upon such a meadow, let him take thereon as upon corn. If he chance 'to find 'them thereon,' and 'cannot overtake them, though confessed,' damage to grass is not to be compensated.

29. Whoever makes a fence about his corn, let him take animals found upon the grass that may be therein, as well as upon the corn; because nothing is to depasture there.

30. No one, ³⁸except a lord,' is to have more than two reserves of grass, a field, and a meadow; and, if he will to keep 'it, let him obtain a cross from the lord, and under the sanction of that let him keep it.

31. Thus animals trespassing upon corn are to be impounded: if they be wild, they are to be taken and placed out in a yard; if they be tame animals, they may be impounded, in or out, at pleasure. If there be animals belonging to two different persons, they are not to be mixed together; and if they be animals of different species, they are not to be mixed; but, if they be placed together, every one of them is to be tied. It is not right to tie swine, ⁷⁹only to take' them. It is right to tie poultry and geese, in taking them.

33. Whoever is entitled to corn, either by surety; or for damage done by cattle in the harvest; or by purchase; and shall not demand it before the calends of winter; he is not afterwards entitled to it; because he has suffered the proper period for urging his claim to elapse: for it is not right to claim corn from one year to another.

34. Whoever in taking cattle shall injure them, whatever the nature of the injury, the taker is to pay for it; for the animals are to return home without claim, without suit, except payment to the taker of ⁸²the property.

35. Whatsoever person shall impound an animal, and suffer it to graze; he is not to lose his claim, for doing more than right.

36. Whoever shall take animals, and they break out and get home, nothing is due for them; for it is not right that there should be two takings for one trespass.

37. Whoever shall impound an animal, and refuse a lawful pledge, requiring money; if the animal die, he is to pay for it.

* Dyved, or West Wales, in strict acceptation, was the name of the district bounded by the Tywi on the S.E. and by the Teivi on the N.W.; but in a wider sense the country over which the ecclesiastical supremacy of the see of Menevia extended.

And he began to write them in three parts: the first, the daily law of the palace; the second, the law of the country; the third, the perfect administration of each of them. In the next place, the king ordered three law books to be prepared: one for the use of the daily court, to remain continually with himself; another for the court of Dinevwr; the third for the court of Aberfraw: so that the three divisions of Cymru, namely, Gwynedd, Powys, and South Wales, might have continually amongst them the authority of the law, ready for their reference at all times.

And by the advice of those wise men, the king retained some of the old laws; others he amended; others he abolished entirely, and established new laws in their place. And then he fully promulgated the law among the people; and he supported it with his authority; and the malediction of God, as well as 'theirs, and that of all Cymru, was pronounced upon such as should not thenceforth observe it, in the manner then set forth; unless altered by the concurrence of the country and the lord.

⁶²Here is the book of the law made by Howel the good at the White House upon Tav, 'in Dyved, to which there' came, by the summons of Howel, six of the wisest laics from every cymwd in Cymru, and seven score croziers, archbishops, and bishops, ⁶³and good teachers,' and abbots, ⁶⁴and priors,' being the wise men of all Cymru. Twelve of the wisest of that number were set apart to form the law, with one clerk, the most learned in all Cymru, to write the law, and to guard against doing any thing in opposition to the law of the church, or the law of the emperor.

Here are the names of all those laymen, that is to say:
Morgeneu, the judge;
Cyvnerth, his son;
⁶⁵Gwair, son of ⁶⁶Ruvon;

⁶⁷his,
⁶⁸although there are likewise in it many other good laws made by wise men previously and afterwards; and what is inserted in the law of Howel is to be credited; and together

Gwyn, the maer, the man who was the owner of Glantavwyn, to whom the house belonged in which the law was made ; and Blegewryd, archdeacon of Llandav, was the clerk, and he was a doctor in the law of the emperor and in the law of the church.

After the law had been all made, and completely written, Howel the good, accompanied by princes of Cymru, and ⁴Lambert, bishop of Menevia, and Mordav, bishop of Bangor, and Cebur, bishop of Saint Asaph, and Blegewryd, archdeacon of Llandav, went to Rome, to pope Anastatius, to read the law, and to see if there were anything contrary to the law of God in it ; and as there was nothing militating against it, it was confirmed, and was called the law of Howel the good from that time forward.

The year of the Lord Jesus Christ at that time, nine hundred and fourteen. And here are the verses composed by Blegewryd thereupon, in testimony of that event.

³⁴The year of Christ, when king Howel the good went to Rome to confirm his laws by papal authority, was nine hundred and fourteen.'

³⁵The year of Christ was nine hundred and ³⁶forty when Howel the good died, the chief and glory of all the Britons.'

³⁷The year of the Lord Jesus when Howel the good, son of Cadell, son of Rodri, son of ³⁸Camwri, died, 948.

¹⁸The discrepancy in the dates concerning the death of Howel is occasioned by the account in S. being taken from a chronicle in which the events of a decade were not particularized. See 'The Chronicle of the Princes of Wales,' page 847.

[THE LAWS OF THE COURT.]

I. OF THE OFFICERS OF THE COURT.]

1. First, the king instituted the law of his daily court; and at the first he established twenty-four officers in the daily service of his court, that is to say :

1. Chief of the household.
2. Priest of the household.
3. Steward.
4. Judge of the court.
5. Falconer.
6. Chief groom.
7. Chief huntsman.
8. Page of the chamber.
9. Steward to the queen.
10. Priest to the queen.
11. Bard of the household.
12. Silentiary of the court.
13. Door-ward of the hall.
14. Door-ward of the chamber.
15. Chambermaid.
16. Groom of the rein.
17. Candle-bearer.
18. Butler.
19. Mead brewer.
20. Sewer of the court.
21. Cook.
22. Footholder.
23. Mediciner of the court.
24. Groom of the rein to the queen.

2. The due of these officers is to have woollen clothing from the king, and linen clothing from the queen, three times in the year; at Christmas, at Easter, and at Whitsuntide.

3. The queen is to have a third from the king of the produce accruing to him from his land; and in like manner, the officers of the queen are to have a third of the produce of the officers of the king.

4. The queen is to have a progress, with the maids and youths, among the villains of the king, when the king is absent from his own land.

II. [OF THE KING.]

1. The worth of the king is three times the amount of his saraad, with three augmentations.

2. Of saraad to a king this is. There are three saraads to the king: one is, violating his protection; that is, killing a person under his protection; the second is, when two kings meet upon their boundaries, for the purpose of an interview; if a person be killed in their presence, it is saraad to the king; the third is, to misuse his wife; that is, having connexion with her.

3. Of the saraad of every married man.

There are three kinds of saraad to every married man: one is, to strike him upon his body; the second is, the misuse of his wife by another; the third is, violating the protection of a person qualified by law to give protection to another.

4. Of paying a king's saraad.

Thus is a king's saraad to be paid: a hundred kine, for every cantref of his lordship; and a silver rod, as long as from the floor to his lips when seated in his chair, and as thick as his long finger, with three knobs at the top, and three at the bottom of it, of the thickness of the rod; and a gold cup ¹⁹on it, that shall hold the king's full draught therein, having on it a golden cover of the breadth of the king's face; and both the cup and the cover are to be as thick as the nail of a ploughman who has ploughed for seven years, or the shell of a goose egg.

5. In this manner the saraad of a king is to be paid, possessing a principal seat; as Dinevwr, under the king of South Wales; or Aberfraw, under the king of Gwynedd: if he have not a principal seat, he is only to have cattle.

6. The privilege of the lord of Dinevwr is, to have for his saraad as many white cattle with red ears, as shall extend in close succession from Argoel to the palace of ⁴Dinevwr, with a bull of the same colour along with each score of them.

7. Gold is only paid to the king of Dinevwr, or to the king of Aberfraw.

III. OF SARAAD TO THE QUEEN.

i. By three means saraad is done to the queen: when her protection is violated; or, when she is struck in anger; or, when a thing is snatched by force out of her hand: the third of the worth of the king's saraad is to be paid to the queen, for her saraad, without gold and without silver.

IV. OF THE KING'S RETINUE.

1. The king is to have thirty-six horsemen in attendance; that is, the twenty-four officers, and the twelve gwestais; his household, his uchelwrs, his youths, his minstrels, and his almsmen.

V. [OF THE EDLING.]

1. The heir-apparent, that is, the edling, who is to reign after the king, is to be honoured above all in the court, excepting the king and the queen; and he should be a son or a brother of the king.

2. His place in the hall is on the opposite side of the fire to the king; and next to him the judge, between him and the column; and next to him the priest of the household; and on the other side of the edling, the chief of song of the country; after him, there is no privileged place for any one, on that side.

3. The worth of the edling is of like kind with the worth of the king; but less by the third part.

4. The worth of each of the other heirs to the kingdom in succession is a third of the worth of the king; and in like manner the amount of the saraad of each of them, without gold and without silver.

5. The king is to provide for the whole expense of the edling, and all his necessaries, honourably.

6. The lodging of the edling is the hall of the king; and along with him are to be the youths; and the woodman is to light the fire for him, and to shut the doors, after he shall have gone to sleep.

7. He is to have an allowance without measure, for he is to have a sufficiency.

8. There are three kinds of persons, a king, a "breyr," and a villain, with their near relations. The near relations of the king are such as have kingly privilege attached to them, though not actually possessing it; and, of all those, the most royal is the edling; for he is placed in the station of presumptive heir to the kingdom in the session of the court: nevertheless, when they obtain possession of land, their privilege becomes merged in the privilege of the land they succeed to.

VI. [OF APPROPRIATE PLACES.]

1. *At the time when the king sits in his seat, at the three principal festivals, he is to place on his left such boneddig as may have privilege by inheritance to sit beside him; the canghellor beside that person; after that, the falconer; and on his right, whoever he may will; and then let all the rest sit, and take precedence, as they will: the foot-holder is to sit under the king's feet, and the candle-bearer before him.

VII. [OF THE PROTECTIONS.]

1. From the time when the steward stands in the hall, and proclaims the protection of God, and that of the king and queen and of the gwrdaŷ, and their peace, upon the court and the company; the individual who shall break that peace is to have no protection anywhere: because that is the protection of all generally; and especially the protection of the king; and, on that account, there is no protection for him from any one of them, neither by relicŷ, nor by church.

2. No one of the officers of the king's court has the power of giving protection, unless one of them shall represent them all, and say, that he will grant protection for the whole to every one in the name of the person it is sought from.

3. The protection of the queen is, to convey the person, to whom she grants protection, beyond the confine of the country, without pursuit and without obstruction.

4. The protection of the chief of the household is, to convey the person beyond the limit of the cymwd wherein he may be.

5. The protection of the priest of the household is, to convey the person to the nearest church.

6. The protection of the steward is, from the time he shall begin to stand in his office, until the last person in the palace retires to sleep.

7. The protection of the falconer is, to accompany the person to the furthest spot where he has been hawking on that day.

8. The protection of the judge is, to ac-

17. The protection of the porter is, to keep the person to whom protection is granted, until the chief of the household shall pass through the gate towards his lodging, under whose protection he is to be allowed to go, until the last person shall quit the palace.

18. The protection of the door-ward of the chamber is, to accompany the person to the porter.

19. The protection of the chambermaid is equal to the protection of the page of the chamber to the king.

20. The protection of the groom of the rein is, whilst the smith of the court makes four shoes with their complement of nails, and whilst he shall shoe the king's steed.

24. The protection of the sewer of the court is, from the time he shall begin to distribute the meat, until the last person shall have had his meat.

25. The protection of the cook is, from the time he shall begin to turn the first collop, until the last shall be ⁹placed before the king and the queen.

26. The protection of the foot-holder is, from the time he shall begin to sit under the king's feet, until he retires to his chamber.

27. The protection of the mediciner is, from the time he quits his chamber, by order of the king, to visit the sick, until he returns to the palace.

28. The protection of the groom of the rein to the queen is similar to the protection of the groom of the rein to the king.

29. The protection of the woodman is, unto the furthest spot whither he goes to collect fuel, and as far beyond as he can throw his bill-hook.

30. The porter and the woodman are not of the number of the twenty-four officers.

31. Whichever of them shall have his protection violated, it is saraad to him.

32. If the mediciner of the palace professionally attend any wounded patient of the men of the court, until he be well, he is to have his bloody clothes; and the upper garment of the king, on his first visit to the patient.

Hitherto we have treated concerning protections.

VIII. WE WILL NOW SPEAK OF WHAT IS TO BE PAID ON ACCOUNT OF THE SARAAD, AND THE WORTH, OF EACH OF THESE OFFICERS.

1. The saraad of the chief of the household is a third of the king's saraad :

2. And his worth is a third of the king's worth : and each without gold and without silver.

judge of the court, falconer, page of the chamber, and chambermaid, is nine kine, and nine score of silver.

4. The worth of each of them is nine score and nine kine, with three augmentations: others say, in respect to the steward, that his saraad and galanas are to be doubled.

5. The saraad of each of the remaining ⁴⁴servants is six kine, and six score of silver.

6. The galanas of each of them is ⁴⁵six score and six kine, with three augmentations.

7. When a person is killed, his saraad is to be first paid; and then his worth; since no one can be killed without saraad to him: but they are to be paid without augmentation.

8. There is to be no augmentation of the saraad of any one ⁴⁶who is dead.

9. Whoever does saraad to the priest of the household, or shall kill him, is amenable to the laws of the synod; but not for tongue-wound.

IX. [OF THE LODGINGS.]

1. The lodging of the chief of the household is to be the largest house in the middle of the trev; for the household are to lodge around him, so that they may be prepared for all the king's affairs. The bard of the household, and the mediciner of the court, are to lodge with the chief of the household.

2. The lodging of the steward, and of the ⁴⁷servants along with him, is to be the house nearest to the palace; because it is his duty to serve the palace, and to superintend the kitchen.

3. The lodging of the priest and the clerks, is to be in the house of the chaplain of the trev; and the queen's priest is to lodge with them.

4. The chief huntsman, and the other huntsmen, are to lodge in the king's kiln-house.

5. The chief groom is to lodge in the house next to the king's barn, having the grooms along with him; because he is to distribute the provender for the horses, and to assign their stables.

20. If the king will to appoint any one ²rash, unskilful, and unexperienced in the law, to be a judge of the court; that person ought to attend the court, in the king's company, questioning, and listening to the judges, who attend at the court from a border country; and learning the laws, usages, customs, and institutions of the king, that pertain to his authority; and especially, the three columns of law; the worth of all tame and wild animals, of which men make use; and hear plaintiffs stating their claims, and defendants answering, in the pleadings; and to be with judges in giving decisions, and listening to their disputations, if they appeal to the king, in what may be dubious to them, and which they might be desirous, through him, to have explained; and let him proceed in that manner through a whole year. And then the king's chaplain is to take him to the church, having with him the twelve principal officers of the court, to mass; and after mass, and an offering by every one, let the chaplain require him to swear by the relics, and by the altar, and by the consecrated elements placed upon the altar, that he will never deliver a wrong judgment knowingly, either through the entreaty of any one, or for worth, or for love, or for hatred of any one. After that, let them repair together to the king, and declare what they have done in respect to him: then the king is to confer upon him his office, if satisfied with him, and instal him in a seat appropriate for him: then ornamental trinkets are to be given him, a throw-board by the king, and gold ⁴ring by the queen; and let him never give nor sell them.

21. No person ought to be a judge ⁶⁶of the court, but such as shall be instructed in this manner; or one who is proficient in the law, and will swear, as said before, that he will not pronounce a wrong judgment knowingly during his life.

to a judge: one is, to issue proclamations, as the king may require; the second is, to set forth and investigate plaints introduced in court; the third is, that what he may determine by judgment, he will confirm by pledge and law book, if he be required to join in pledge; or, if the king require it of him, without joining in a pledge.

23. If judgment be given in a cause, and the judgment be doubted by one of the parties to the suit: that the sentence may be fixed on the person that pronounced it, there being many judges concerned, and a dispute on whom the sentence is to be fixed, whether on all or one; the law says, if the judge of the court be present at the judgment he is to own it; if he be not, and a judge of a cymwd be, the sentence belongs to him; if he be not, the judge who first pronounced it is to own it by law. The cause is, lest the judges disagree, and the law saying that the ninth person to be credited on his own testimony is a judge as to his judgment between two parties, if there be a dispute between them: likewise there cannot be a mutual pledging with any one, as to judgment, but with the one who pronounced it; for it is after judgment pronounced that a pledge is to be given against it.

24. There are three doubtings respecting judgment: one is, when there is a dispute between plaintiff and defendant, as to the

"³⁴ and variance should arise which of them should own the decision; the law says that the judge that decided shall acknowledge it; because the words of a judge are to be credited in pronouncing a doubted judgment between plaintiff and defendant, as it does not pertain to him to be a party to the matter and to the strife: and if it chance that a judge is forced to be a party by mutual pledge, then it pertains to the president to keep the cause in impartial remembrance until decision in law of the judgment of the pleadings by written law, or a similar precedent in the reading of men learned in law with authority, called in behalf of the president, and not being parties: and this is one of the places it pertains between the lord and . . . that preservation.

XV. CHIEF GROOM.

1. The chief groom is to have, from the steward, an ox hide in winter, and a cow hide in summer, to make halters for the king's horses; and that before the skins are divided between the steward and the officers.

2. He is to have the legs of the cattle slaughtered in the kitchen.

3. And he is to have the share of two men of the 'gwestva silver.

4. He is to have the old saddles and the old bridles of the king's steed.

5. The chief groom, and the grooms, are to have all the wild colts, accruing to the king as the third of spoil.

6. He is to have an allowance; that is to say, a mess.

7. He is to deliver every horse 'given by' the king; and for every horse, he is to have four-pence, except for three: the horse given to the priest of the household; and the one given to the judge of the court; and the one given to the jester, for the end of its halter is to be tied to his testicles; and so it is to be delivered:
he is to deliver a halter with every horse.

8. He is to bring out his horse caparisoned for the judge; and the judge is to explain to him the law, and his duty, gratuitously.

9. He is to have his land free, from the king.

10. His horse is to have two rations of the provender.

11. The place of the chief groom and his companions in the hall is by the column nearest to the king.

12. He, and the chief huntsman, and the foot-holder, do not sit in the hall by the wall; each of them knows his place.

XXVI. [OF THE MEDICINER OF THE COURT.]

1. The mediciner of the court's saraad and galanas are as described before.

2. He is to sit next to the chief of the household.

3. He is to have his land free.

4. And he is to have his horse from the king.

5. He is to give his professional attendance gratuitously to all the officers of the palace; for he is to have from them only the bloody clothes, cut with weapons; excepting for those that are called the three deadly wounds in a person; for each of those he is to have one pound, without his food; or nine score pence, with his victuals: those three wounds are, the cutting a person's head unto the brain; or the stabbing a person in his trunk unto the interior; or the breaking one of the four limbs of a man's body; his two arms, and his two thighs.

6. His daughter has the same privilege as the daughter of the bard of the household.

XXVII. [OF THE SMITH OF THE COURT.]

1. The smith of the court is to have the heads of the oxen and cows slaughtered in the palace.

2. He is to have food, for himself and his servant, from the palace.

3. He likewise is to have the feet of all the cattle.

4. He is to do all the king's work without pay; except making three things, a broad-edged ax, a cauldron, and a spear head; for those he is to have the worth of his work: it is more correctly said, that he is to have the worth of his work on the king's cauldron, the iron fastenings of his castle gate, and the irons of his mill.

5. He is to have ⁴³ceinon at carousals.

6. From every prisoner off whom he takes the irons, when liberated, he is to have four pence.

7. He is to have his land free.

XXVIII. [OF THE LAND MAER.]

1. The land maer is to have the skins of the oxen and cows slaughtered 'out of' the palace, if he has had the custody of them for three nights.

2. He is to have the amobyr of the daughters of the villains who are within the maer-treys of the palace;

3. And the tallow and lard of the animals of the palace.

4. Though the servants of the palace may do saraad to the land maer, while carrying victuals and drink out of the kitchen and out of the mead cellar towards the hall, there is to be no redress for him on that account.

XXIX. [OF THE APPARITOR.]

1. The apparitor is to have his land free.

2. He is to stand between the two columns, whilst the lord is at his meal; because he is then to protect the hall against fire: and, after meat, 'let him eat' along with the servants; and, after that, let him not sit, nor strike the post nearest to the king.

3. He is to have lawful liquor; that is to say, the fill of the vessels used in serving of the ale; their half of the bragot; and their third of the mead.

4. He is to have the legs of the cattle slaughtered in the kitchen, to make buskins for him, that are not to be higher than his ankles.

5. The ninth day before the calends of winter, he is to have a coat, a shirt, a cap, and three rod lengths, from his elbow to the end of his middle finger, of linnen, to make trousers: his clothes are only to

6. He is to share the corn of the runaway taeogs, and their marwdy, between ⁷the king, ⁸the maer, and the canghellor: he is to have the sheaf that may be over in sharing.

7. The apparitor is to have, from the marwdy, the bacon in cut, the butter in cut, the nether stone of the quern, all the unbleached flax, and the layer nearest the ground of the corn; and if there be corn not reaped, he is to have all the head lands; also the fowls, the cats, and the hatchets.

8. He is to have a loaf, with its enllyn, at every house where he comes upon the king's errands.

9. The spear of the apparitor is not to be more than three ⁹rods in length; lest he should be perceived on coming to summon.

10. There is to be no tennliv in his trousers.

11. From the spoil, at the taking of which the king may be present, the apparitor is to have the bull; and if there be no bull, he is to have a fair young ox, that has never been under a yoke, or a milch heifer.

12. When an apparitor dies, his property is to be at the mercy of the lord.

13. When the chief huntsman is to be distrained, for his wrong, the apparitor is to make the distress.

14. If saraad be done to the apparitor, while sitting at the king's courts, he is to have only a sievel of tail oats and an addle egg, in payment for his saraad; since he ought not to sit whilst the king's courts are holden.

XXX. [TRIADS.]

1. By three means a summons is supported: by witnesses; by suretiship; or by distress.

2. Three summonses ^acan be denied before the time of the appearing of witnesses: a summons with witnessing is only practised in respect to land that is claimed by kin and descent, through the nine days of May, or ^b'the calends of winter; if land, or other thing, be proceeded for otherwise, and one summons be denied by oath, by suretiship ^c'the summons is to be confirmed against the person who shall deny it: where suretiship shall once fail, possession is then to be taken; and if land be claimed, then land is to be seized: failure of suretiship is, surety not being given where it is due, or being given and neglected: neglect of a summons or suretiship is, that the party does not appear to answer on the day appointed to be called in court; or to defend his not answering.

3. Three persons who ought not to be summoned: a witness; a guarantor; and an acting or confessed confederate; for such suretiship is requisite.

4. There are three sorts of denying: first, a denial altogether in a suit that is instituted against a person; and that is to be denied through a raith fixed as to number, with neither more nor less; the second is, acknowledging part, in a suit for a misdeed, and denying the complete act; and then it is to be denied by augmenting the fixed raith; as in the columns of law in respect to murder, wherein fifty men swear in denying murder, and all its accessories; then a hundred swear, or two hundred, or three hundred, in denying murder, and acknowledging an accessory; the third is, denying part, and acknowledging another part, of a suit without a criminal act therein; and then it is denied by diminishing a fixed raith, as in the case of suretiship; where the surety swears as one of seven, in denying his suretiship entirely; then he swears alone, in denying a part, and acknowledging another part of the suretiship.

5. There are three sureties, of whom no one shall decide his suretiship by his own oath alone, though denying part, and acknowledging another part of his surety: that is, a person who becomes surety in the presence of the court; and an inefficient surety; and a debtor surety: whatever the first shall swear, the court is to swear with him, or against him; the second is, as well as the third, whatever either may swear, it is as one of seven men next of kin he is to swear; because each of them, by law, is a debtor, ¹³at the time of fixing the debtorship. And this is the difference that exists between an inefficient surety and a debtor surety: an inefficient surety, the law denominates such surety as fails in the fulfilment of his suretiship towards the claimant, when reminded in the days of the sitting of the court; and a debtor surety, such as becomes surety for a person unable to abide law on account of poverty; and in that case the inability of the party compels the surety to be a debtor.

6. There are two kinds of failures which cause a surety to answer in law: one of them is, poverty, being destitute of three garments, so as to be able to pay the two at all times, and retain to himself the third: the time for such payment is, from one eighth day to the other, from the gaining of a suit; and on the day when the debtor shall fail, let the surety pay the whole of what remains due; and this is a suretiship which continues beyond a fixed day: the second is, when the debtor leaves the country before the appointed day of payment, or afterwards: if it be before the appointed day of payment, let the surety pay one moiety, and his suretiship is to remain in force as to the other moiety unto the end of a year and a day; and then let the surety pay the whole, unless the debtor shall abide the law, and the surety is to be at liberty to make a demand on the debtor when he shall think fit: if it be after the appointed day, let it be examined, whether it has been through the neglect of the plaintiff, in respect to proceeding according to legal time, or otherwise: the time of the law then to commence proceedings is within the space of nine days, reckoning the appointed day of payment; since it is not correct to grant a shorter time, lest there should chance to be claims in several places; and, unless he shall commence proceedings by the law of the court, and by plaint, let the time of the obligation of the suretyship be deemed to have passed away in the path of oblivion ; in the same manner as if the claimant were to grant time for the debtor, in the absence of the surety, after the appointed day of payment.'

7. There are three sorts of oaths : supporting truth, by swearing through and through ; the second is, denying a falsehood, by swearing through and through ; the third is, swearing to a doubtful matter conscientiously, when it is not certainly known whether it may be true or false.

8. By three ways may the plea of a suit be determined : the first is, by sufferance ; for sufferance abrogates every plea : if a judge quietly suffer a pledge against his judgment to be given, without then giving a counter-pledge, his judgment falls to the ground : the second is, a law book^a in regard to two pledges ; that is, a pledge given against a judgment, and another pledge given in support of that judgment : the third is this, a judge is to explain, in a cause between two persons, the judgment pronounced by him between them, mutual pledges not having been given.

9. There are three sorts of informations, and in respect to each a raith of the country is incumbent upon a person for theft : one is, the coming of the loser of the property, with an informant, swearing against another, of having heard and of knowing him to be guilty of the theft : the second is, when the informant swears to having seen and known him to be the thief : and that is called an accusation : the third is, obstructing a person in obtaining his lost property in the place he may suppose it to be. No one is to produce a raith of the country for theft, without one of these informations against him, unless he should fail in the oath of an absolver, to the loser ; if he fail, there

11. By three means a judge loses a camlwrw in judging, and is not to pay the worth of his tongue: one is, when he judges contrary to what he had previously decided in similar causes; the second is, when he strays from the point, in summing up in a cause, by affirming more or less therein of points than there had been; the third is, when he gives no pledge with his judgment, when another gives one against him: in the first case the ¹wrong decision is to be annulled; in the second his summary is to be rectified; in the third, his decision is likewise to be annulled, though it may be right; since the judge has not supported it at the time by a pledge. If the party in the suit shall neglect to enter into a mutual pledge with the judge on his first summing up, he is debarred from mutually pledging, as to that judgment afterwards, although the judgment may be wrong: in a similar manner, if he produce his pledge in due time, and the judge shall not mutually pledge with him, his judgment falls to the ground.

11. For each of the second three, twice nine score of silver is to be paid; with the oaths of two hundred men, to deny murder. Dewi of Brevi!

12. For each of the three last, thrice nine score of silver is to be paid; with the oaths of three hundred men, to deny murder, if demanded.

13. Whoever shall deny murder, and its accessaries altogether, is to give the oaths of fifty men: and that is a raith of the country; and it is called a denial of wood and field: and similar to this, whoever shall deny murder, apart from the accessaries, or one accessory alone, is to give the oaths of fifty men: and in the same manner in respect to burning, and theft, and their accessaries, if a prosecution be instituted for burning with violence, or through theft; and, if a man be burned in that fire, there are to be in that raith three persons under vows of abstinence from riding, from linen, and from women.

14. Whoever shall confess galanas; he and his kindred shall pay the whole of the saraad and galanas of the person killed; and, in the first place, the murderer shall pay the saraad of the person to the father, the mother, the brothers, and the sisters; and if he was married, the widow is to receive from them the third of the saraad of her husband.

15. The worth of a person murdered is to be shared into three shares, as to those who are to pay it: the first share falls upon the murderer, his father, his mother, his brothers, and his sisters; and the other two shares upon his kindred.

16. The above first share is to be shared into three shares: one upon the murderer himself; and the other two shares upon his father, his mother, his brothers, and his sisters; and each man of these pays as much as the other; and the like as to the women, except that one woman is to pay receive, any part of a galanas; because the share of the murderer, who pays more than any other, stands for him and for his children, for the care of them rests upon him; the care of the children of the murdered pertains to the parents; and his co-heirs receive the third of the galanas, and the whole of the saraad: and on that account the respective heirs neither pay nor receive a share of the galanas.

32. If there be a relative of the murderer, or of the murdered, who is an ecclesiastic in holy orders, or in an ecclesiastical community, or leprous, or dumb, or an idiot, such neither pays nor receives any part of galanas. No vengeance is to be exercised against any one of those for galanas; neither are they to avenge a relative that is killed: and they cannot in any way be compelled to pay, or receive, any thing on account of galanas.

33. There are three severe losses of a kindred: one is, when a kindred stock commence paying the galanas of a person killed, and the whole be not paid, and on that account one of such kindred stock be murdered; the galanas for that individual is not to be paid; neither is any thing to be restored of what had been paid on account of the first: the second is, if a reputed son among a kindred, neither adopted, nor denied, kill a person; that kindred must pay the whole of such galanas, on his part; and, if they afterwards deny him, it is a severe loss: the third is, when an innocent person is accused of murder, and neglects to seek justice; if he be killed on account of it, nothing is to be paid for him, though innocent; since a kindred cannot deny, after his death, what he did not deny during his lifetime.

34. A calamitous galanas is, when a person shall kill another, and make an appointment to compensate it, and he also be killed by a person of another kindred, who has no claim upon him; such is called a calamitous galanas, because of the affliction of losing him, and of leaving the crime committed by him to be compensated by his kindred.

35. Whoever shall deny the killing of a person in the hosts; let him pay six score pence, and let him give the oaths of fifty men. Dewi of Brevi!

II. OF THE NINE ACCESSARIES OF FIRE.

1. The first is, counselling to go to burn.
2. The second is, agreeing with the person who shall burn.
3. The third is, going in the company of the person who shall burn to the place to be burned.
4. The fourth is, carrying the cresset.
5. The fifth is, striking the fire.
6. The sixth is, procuring tinder.
7. The seventh is, blowing the fire, until it shall kindle.
8. The eighth is, giving the fire to the person who shall burn with it.
9. The ninth is, looking on the fire and suffering it.
10. Whoever shall deny one of these accessaries; let him give the oaths of fifty men.

11. The person who shall strike fire, or shall blow it until it shall kindle, or who shall give fire to him who shall burn with it, is to pay one half of the damage done by that fire, and the other half falls upon him who shall put the fire into the thing burned: and that comprehends the whole act of burning. And, if there be no necessary along with him, he is himself to pay the whole damage occasioned by that burning, unless he can clear himself by a raith of the country.

12. Let the first house burnt in the trev, through negligence, pay for the first two houses which shall take fire on that account; one on each side.

13. Whoever shall lend a house and fire to another person; if that person kindle a fire thrice in the house, he shall make full payment if the house be burnt.

for proof is not usual in this law. If the witnesses be found to agree with the complainant in their testimony, let the complainant testify the same thing to others a second time; should the defendant then keep silent, the first witnesses are to testify that the defendant did not gainsay them: but, if he should object to them, then let them testify to their being ⁴untimely objected to: and, in that manner, in the two points, through proved witnesses he is to be proceeded against.

2. If the defendant proceed in a better way, let him tell the witnesses: 'Though you have offered your testimony upon your word, you will not confirm it by your oath:' it is then adjudged that the witnesses are again to confirm their testimony by oath, as it had been testified to them: if they swear, and are not objected to, the plaintiff succeeds; but if they fail, the defendant succeeds: it is evident, that it is after the oath the defendant is to object to the witnesses; if he object to them before the oath, he loses his suit.

3. There are three causes for objecting to witnesses: one is, murder, without mutual satisfaction; the second is, an undetermined suit in respect to land between them; the third is, the seduction by one of the wife of the other: if they can be objected to, they become inefficient; if they cannot be objected to, they are efficient witnesses.

4. Witnesses may be contravened, when they begin their testimony, as they stand, so that there may be no necessity for objecting to them; so also may evidences; that is to say, on account of worth and reward; or, from their being interested in the suit; or, for an acknowledged breach of faith; or, for notorious perjury; or, for ⁴notorious theft; or, from being excommunicated by name: if that can be proved, by the country, against them, their contravention will succeed.

5. In the law of Rome it prevails, where the number of witnesses is not specified, that two witnesses are sufficient: this law

8. The eighth is, the shepherd of a hamlet, as to a beast killed by the animals of the hamlet, in his presence, and in his custody.

9. The ninth is, a thief at the gallows, when he is certain of being hanged; he is to be believed, without a relic, as to his fellow thief, and as to what was stolen: his fellow thief, however, is not to be hanged, upon the mere word of the other, but is ^{to be sold.}

10. A thief, for a reputed theft, if a raith of the country fail him, is by law liable to a dirwy.

11. A contract-man is to be believed, as to the contract between two persons who shall acknowledge it. And so also the giver of property, as to what he may give; and agreeably to that it is said, there is no gift but during consent: and so the giver away of a woman shall swear as to the manner in which the woman may be given. May Dewi of Brevi help us.

12. Whoever shall call witnesses, and is not able to bring them forward; let the suit drop.

13. The time allowed for witnesses, or a guarantor, from a border country, is a fortnight.

14. The time allowed for witnesses, or a guarantor, from beyond the sea, is a year and a day.

15. Whoever shall commence a suit against a criminal, who is present and ready to answer; and afterwards be silent for a year and a day, in that special suit; he is not to be listened to thenceforth, unless the law shall have failed him within the year.

VI. [OF SURETIES.]

1. A debtor who shall not pay the whole of a debt, which he ought to pay; if there be, between the debtor and the creditor, an appointed day for paying the debt, the latter is to wait until the day.

2. Whoever shall demand his debt by plaint prior to the stated time; for so long a time he is to be without it after the stated time.

3. Whoever shall make a distress on account of a debt, without leave of the judicature, is subject to a camlwrw.

4. In three ways a surety is exonerated from an acknowledged debt: one is, by time being granted, ⁴without his consent, beyond the time first fixed; the second is, by the payment of the debt; the third is, by a distress being made for the debt ⁷without the consent of the surety.

5. The time given for a surety, to know whether he be a surety or not a surety, is three days.

6. It is necessary, in producing a person to become ⁶surety, that three hands come together: the hand of the surety; the hand of the person ⁶who shall give him as ⁶surety; and the hand of the person who shall accept him as surety; and thus mutually plighting of troth, from hand to hand.

7. If there be one hand wanting of these, in mutually plighting, it is denominated a ⁶slip surety; excepting where a person comes as a debtor surety, on behalf of himself, or of another whom he does not produce as surety: the nature of a ⁶slip surety is, that one end is bound, and the other loose; and on that account, if the creditor accept the faith of the debtor for paying the debt, and the faith of the surety for compelling the debtor to pay the debt, then each of them must be responsible, by his agreement, to the creditor: if he take but the faith of one of them, then only one of them is responsible to him: if the surety give his faith to the creditor, to insure to him his debt, he must be responsible to him for the whole debt, since he takes not the faith of the debtor.

8. When the appointed time for payment has arrived, the surety is entitled to time, to apply to the debtor.

9. The time for a surety to prepare payment is a ⁶week and a day, if it be necessary for him to pay.

10. By three ways may time be extended to surety and debtor: from hearing the horn of the king, proceeding with his army; and from suffering violence; and from a prosecution for theft.

11. There are three scandals of a surety :
denying his surety, he being surety ; acknowledging his surety, and being unable to accomplish it ; and the nullifying of a surety after it is given.

12. A surety is to convey a distress along with the ⁶⁸creditor until it be secure, or let him pay the debt.

13. A distress upon the debtor is not to be taken, unless delivered by the surety.

14. Though the surety become responsible for payment, let him not pay until the debtor shall fail ; and he fails not whilst he shall conform to the law : although he may have only three garments, he is to pay two, and always retain the third about him.

15. A surety who shall deny his suretiship, let him deny it along with six persons nearest to himself in worth ; and, if he deny briduw, he himself is to swear upon seven sacred altars or seven times upon the same altar.

16. If the debtor deny the surety, let him deny along with six persons nearest to himself in worth.

17. If the surety deny one part of his suretiship, and acknowledge another part ;
he himself is to swear once thereto.

18. Whoever shall buy property of another, and shall be himself surety for the worth of the property, and die before payment of the debt, and leave the property in the custody of friends ; the claimant is entitled to payment for that property ; because the dead, who became debtor surety to him, was owner of that property : he ought, however, to swear along with six persons nearest to himself in worth, upon the grave of the debtor, if he can find it, and, if he cannot, let him swear upon the sacred altar, to having sold that property to him, and to that person's being debtor surety to him for the worth of the property.

19. Whoever may become a gorrudog surety for another, is not to be freed until the end of a year and a day ; and he is not to be molested within that space for the crime committed by the person ;

because the surety is bound in the cause, until he shall know whether the criminal will abide the law or not before the expiration of that term.

20. Whoever shall accept surety for a debt, and the surety die before payment of the debt; let him come upon the grave of the surety, and swear along with six persons nearest to himself in worth, that the deceased was surety to him for that debt, if he find the grave; and if he do not, let him swear upon the sacred altar: and, after that, the lord is to compel the fulfilment of the suretiship for the deceased.

21. If the debtor should die, and the surety be living, let the surety proceed as to his suretiship in a similar manner, himself swearing upon the grave of the debtor; and then the three nearest degrees of kin to the debtor are to pay the debt; unless the debtor shall have provided in his will for the debt.

22. Although a surety proceed as to his suretiship in opposition to the lord, he is not liable, on that account, to either a dirwy, or a camlwrw, by law.

23. No one is to give an alltud as surety; nor such as may be more powerful than himself; nor a monk, nor a friar, without the consent of his abbot; nor a clerk of a school, without the consent of his master; nor a woman, unless she be the debtor's lady paramount; nor a son, without the consent of his father, whilst under his authority: though such as these should become surety, their suretiship is not to be enforced.

24. Three cases wherein an acknowledged surety exonerates himself in respect to an unacknowledged debt: one is, if a debtor deny his surety; the second is, by one debtor obtaining testimony against another, by examination in court; the third is, by one party objecting to the witnesses of the other, in the court.

25. Three things which do not proceed from suretiship: death; sickness; and imprisonment.

VII. [OF FIGHTING.]

1. There are three kinds of dirwy : one for fighting ; another for violence ; the third for theft.

2. A dirwy is to be twofold, arising in court, or in church if it be a mother church and paramount.

3. For fighting within the churchyard, ⁴fourteen pounds are to be paid : if ⁵out of the churchyard, in' the sanctuary, seven pounds are to be paid. The half of these sums belongs to the abbot, if his privilege be judicial, ecclesiastical, and civil ; and the other half belongs to the ⁶priests and the canons, who shall be there serving God : a similar share shall accrue to the abbot and the canons, for any fighting that takes place among the persons who take sanctuary from the ⁷priests and the abbot. And in like manner every thing is to be shared, that comes to the saint, as offering, and not to the altar, nor to any other person.

4. For fighting that takes place in court, ⁸the seat of a king, the steward is competent to be a plaintiff, if the men who fight do not complain ; for it is a breach of the peace of the court.

5. A camlwrw for fighting is not to be levied, except upon testimony that cannot be objected to, and that by examination ⁹in court.'

6. For fighting that takes place in a sanctuary, either blood or a bruise is a sufficient testimony to the abbot and to the ¹⁰priests, by the ecclesiastical privilege of the abbacy.

7. If there be fighting within the daily court of the king, the dirwy from each of the men who fight, if there be no denial by either of them against the other, or against the steward, is to be six pounds : if it take place without the court, it is to be three pounds.

8. If a raith fail the person who shall deny fighting, he is to pay a dirwy, as if he had not denied at all.

9. The expiation dirwy for a rape on a maid is, a silver rod and a gold cup,

Three arts which a taeog is not to teach to his son without the permission of his lord: scholarship; smithcraft; and bardism: for if the lord be passive until the tonsure be performed on the scholar; or until the smith enter his smithy; or until a bard be graduated in song; he cannot afterwards enslave them.

8. Three crimes, which if a man commit in his own country, 'his son,' on that account, is to forfeit his patrimony by law: the killing of his lord; the killing of his chief of kindred; and the killing of his 'family representative: and that because of the heinousness of those crimes.

9. The three indispensables of the king are: his priest, to say mass, and to bless his meat and drink; his judge of the palace, to decide causes, and to give counsel; and his household, to execute his commands.

10. The three indispensables of a breyr are: his 'harp; his 'plaid; and his 'cauldron.

11. The three indispensables of a taeog are: his 'trough; his door-sill; and his 'rere-dosse.

12. Three things which the king is not to share with any one: his gold treasure; his hawk; and his thief.

13. There are three fours: the first are, four causes for perverting of judgment: the fear of powerful men; the hatred of enemies; the love of friends; and the lust of lucre: the second four are, the four shields which interpose between an individual and a raith of the country, in a prosecution for theft: one of them is, legally harbouring a guest, that is, keeping him from the time of nightfall until the morning, and extending 'the hand' over him three times during that night, and swearing, with the people of the house, in the raith; the second is, birth and rearing, of that trev, who might be a taeog in the morning, becomes on that night a free man; the second is, where the king confers one of the twenty-four offices of a privileged court on a person, who, before the office was given him, was a taeog, and, after it was given, becomes a free man; the third is, a clerk, who, on the day "before he receives" the tonsure, being the son of a taeog, is on that night a free man.

29. The three legal worths of the foetus of a woman: the first is, blood before formation, which is of the value of forty-eight pence, if it perish through cruelty; the second is, before life has entered it, the third of its galanas is to be paid for it, if it perish through cruelty; the third is, after life has entered it, the whole of its galanas is to be paid, if it perish through cruelty.

30. By three modes may reputed children be denied by a kindred: one is, he who is said to be the father of a boy, if he be alive, may deny him upon his own oath; if the father be not alive, the chief of the kindred, with six of the kindred, may deny him; if there be no chief of the kindred, the oaths of fifty men of the tribe may deny him: and thus, a mother, or the kindred of a mother, may introduce such issue to a kindred, if they be passive. Proof is not to be brought on the part of reputed issue, in opposition to a complete denial on the other part; but proof ought to be adduced of the acquiescence of the other party: for acquiescence, in all cases, makes void every plea: if such issue be brought forward by a woman, let her swear on the consecrated altar, if she be not believed without her oath, or if there be not a complete denial, in opposition to her.

31. The three vexations of the wise are: ebriety; adultery; and bad temper.

32. Three persons are entitled to an advocate on their behalf from the king: a woman; an alltud unacquainted with the language; and one with a natural impediment of speech: one person, however, is to choose the advocate; that is, the lord; and he is to compel the advocates to act.

brutes are not cognizable in law: a stallion;
the bull of a hamlet; and a herd boar: the law likewise takes no cognizance of the act of a bull, whilst seeking tufty cows, from the calends of May to the calends of winter; nor of a stallion, whilst following proud mares; nor of a boar, during the brimming season of the swine: their acts then are not to be compensated.

34. Three animals that have no legal worth: an autumn-born pig; a harrier; and an ermine.

35. There are three bloods not amenable to law: blood from a scabby head; blood from a tooth; and blood from the nose:
unless spilled through anger.

36. There are three fires, kindled by a person on his own land, which are not cognizable in law: the fire of heath-burning, from the middle of March to the middle of April; the fire of a hamlet kiln; and the fire of a hamlet smithy, that shall be nine paces from the hamlet, and having either a covering of broom or of sod thereon.

37. Three birds of which the king is to have the worth in whatever spot they shall be killed: a hawk; a falcon; and a raven: the owner of the land whereon they are killed is entitled to fifty pence from the person who shall kill the bird.

38. Three beasts of which the king is to have the worth, in whatever spot they shall be killed: a beaver; a marten; and an ermine: because from them the borders of the king's garments are made.

39. Three things which the law does not allow to be appraised: meal; bees; and coined silver: because their like are to be had.

40. There are three trees which are free to be cut in the king's forest: timber for the roof of a church; timber for spear shafts applied to the use of the king; and timber for a bier.

41. There are three pieces of a hundred perplexities: one is, a thing stolen, whatever way a part or the whole of it may be traced, for there are nine accessories to it;
the second is, a hart belonging to the king, in respect to whosoever shall do wrong concerning it; the third is, a carcass left by a wolf, in respect to wrong done to it.

land borderers, ¹for ascertaining kin and descent; ²that is to say, a man from every randir in that trev, to point out divisions and boundaries between the family stock; the third is, maers, canghellors, and apparitors, to preserve the boundaries of the cymwds; because those boundaries belong to the king.

67. Three things which preserve a memorial, and stand instead of witnesses for a person in respect of his right to land: the toft of an old kiln; or a hob-stone; or a horse-block.

68. Three persons to whom tongue-wound is to be paid: to the king, when a rough word is spoken to him; to a judge, when a pledge is given against him, as to his right judgment, if he can confirm it; and to a priest in his church on the three principal festivals, or when he reads or writes letters before the king.

69. There are three things under cover in the palace: a mead vat; and ²a sentence; and a song, before it is shown to the king.

70. Three persons who support the privilege of the court in the king's absence: the priest of the household; the steward; and the judge of the court: wheresoever these three shall be together, there is the privilege of the court.

71. There are three stays of blood: blood from the head to the breast; blood from the breast to the girdle; and blood from the girdle to the ground: and if it be spilled from the ¹head to the ground, it is called complete blood. The worth of the blood of every person is twenty-four pence, if denied: the first blood is to be denied by the oaths of nine persons; the second blood is to be denied by the oaths of six persons; and the third, by the oaths of three persons: there is to be neither a decrease, nor an increase, of the twenty-four pence in the worth of blood, from whatever part of a person's body it is spilled, although the raiths are varied according to the stays.

80. Three things which do not accord in law: proof as to a deed, excepting three; denial of a gwaesav; and remembrance after judgment.

81. There are three deeds resting upon proof: lawful or unlawful work upon ⁴land, such as the breaking a boundary, or the making a boundary, or other work; the deed of one animal killing another, in the presence of a hamlet herdsman, as to which, the testimony of the herdsman, as an evidence, is to stand; ⁹the testimony of evidences stands likewise as to land; and the testimony of a thief who is hanged for theft, against his fellow thief, is to stand as to his deed.

82. There are three gwaesavs: arddelw; or warrant; or a defence without warrant.

83. There are three remembrances after judgment: a judge suffering a pledge to be given against him, and against his judgment, without then giving a counter pledge, and afterwards offering his pledge in confirmation of it, which is not, by law, to be received, unless it be a void judgment; or the offering a pledge against a judgment, after first suffering it to pass; or the leaving a faulty expression, as to law and judgment, and, after judgment, attempting to get rid of the fault, which is not to be allowed.

84. There are three sure testimonies:
the testimony of the court producing the record; the testimony of evidences, each of whom is to be credited separately, as a father, as to his two sons, or generally as to land; and the testimony of counter-witnesses.

85. Three cases where a record of court will decide: as to the agreement of two parties; and as to the termination of a suit, if the cynglaws of one party come and say that it is determined, and that of the other say that it is not determined; and as to an unlawful act that is done by a lord towards his man in the court.

that he' has not defended, what he has denied, or defended; or testimony against a person of his having said what he did not say: the 'judges of the court, 'who hear them, are to consider them as abortive, at the request of the defendant, if he remember: and these are the three instances wherein evidences are stronger than witnesses.

87. There are three differences between evidences and witnesses: evidences as to what has occurred, bear their testimony prior to examination in court, which witnesses do not; the second is, evidences may declare their knowledge, in the place of witnesses, though it be not testified to them, and witnesses may not; the third is, evidences are to give their testimony in opposition to denial and defence, that is, evidences may prove the truth after falsehood, which witnesses cannot.

88. In three ways evidences are stronger than witnesses: one is, that many evidences may be brought as to one thing, in law, or only one evidence, such as a surety, and there cannot be brought either more or less than two witnesses; the second is, that a person may be subject to dirwy, or sold, through evidences, which cannot be done through witnesses by law; the third is, that they can prove in opposition to a denial, 'or a defence, which cannot be done by witnesses. When a witness, in his testimony, shall testify of a thing lawfully to others, against a defendant; or a defendant, when he shall testify of a thing lawfully, against witnesses; they cannot be objected to; because they are counter-witnesses.

89. There are three testimonies by word, and not brought to the relic: the testimony of a thief at the gallows, against his fellow thief; a testimony against which no contradiction is brought, when given by word;
and the testimony of counter-witnesses:
evidences, in every cause, possess the force of witnesses; and they can effect as much, in every cause, as can be effected by witnesses. Dewi of Brevi!

that grow on the earth; and a thief who is testified against, in denying theft, unless he shall object.

91. There are three thieves liable to a dirwy: one who steals the king's hart, after being killed by his dogs; a thief whose raith shall fail him in denying theft; and a thief who shall feloniously kill an animal belonging to another person, either in his house, or in his yard.

92. There are three thieves liable to be sold: a thief against whom an information has been made through the church; a fellow thief to one who is hanged for theft; and a thief upon whom shall be found, of stolen dead property, what is worth four legal pence, or less.

93. There are three thieves liable to be hanged: a stealer of live property, in whose possession shall be found one animal, upon accusation; a stealer of dead property, in whose possession shall be found the worth of four legal pence, or more; and a stealer of live property, in whose possession shall be found a skin, upon accusation, and is not exculpated as to the animal altogether.

94. Three thieves who shall escape for an acknowledged theft: a necessitous person, who shall traverse three trevs, and nine houses in each trev, without obtaining either alms or gwestva to relieve him; though he be caught, with stolen eatables in his possession, he is free, by law; and a wife, for stealing jointly with her husband; and a stealer of tame fowls, the law sets him free, only paying to their owner the legal worth of the fowls he takes.

95. Three cases wherein a wife is to answer, without her husband: the first is, for homicide, committed by her by the act of hand and foot; the second is, for theft, committed by her, unconnected with her husband; the third is, for the title to land in her own right.

96. Three persons who are unable to strengthen the title of land for any one: the empty-handed; a guardian; and a wrong possessor: because they have not a sure title themselves.

97. By three means may a dirwy for violence become payable: the first is, when his raith shall fail a person in denying violence; the second is, when his defence shall fail the defendant against a person; the third is, when his guarantor shall fail the person who shall call him, in a trial for violence.

98. By three means a suit for violence loses its chief privilege: the first is, by the teithi of violence failing; by living testimony in a trial for violence; and by the plaintiff's complaining of property taken by violence from another, and not from himself: the raith, however, is not greater, in these three cases, than the oaths of three persons; and the penalty not greater, than a camlwrw of three kine to the king, if it cannot be completely denied, or defended. One of three things is lost by him upon whom the violence is committed: either his man; his land, or moveable property; or his privilege.

99. There are three kinds of defence: one is, that no reply shall be made in time to the demand; the second is, a defence that the claim shall never be answered; the third is, a defence, by answering, that nothing shall be lost in the claim.

100. Three things which it is not necessary to answer any one concerning them: the first is, what is detained not contrary to law; the second is, an act the harm of which can be shown, 'if committed,' and it be not shown; the third is, a loss, which the country knows not, by any means of information, that the claimant has suffered.

101. There are three kinds of detention: the first is, taking a thing from a person, and not restoring it; the second is, leaving an injury towards a person, or towards his property, to remain, without making satisfaction or settlement concerning it; the third is, detaining the due of a person beyond the time for paying it.

102. By three means the law shuts between a plaintiff and a defendant: the first is, by losing his time, and that may happen in various ways; the second is, by claim without an owner; the third is, by the previous termination of the suit.

103. There are three lawful terminations of a suit: the first is, a termination by consent of the parties; the second is, an appointed termination by arbitrators between parties; the third is, a termination by judgment.

104. Three suits which are to be amended, and to be judged by the verdict of the country, against arrogance: the first is, a suit concerning a loan, or a pledge, or a distress, which are under one law; the second is, a suit, wherein there is a defence, 'or otherwise' a denial, in respect to land; the third is, a suit, for oppression by the king contrary to law.

105. By three means land is to be sued for: through wrong possession; by daden-hudd through the occupation of father, or mother, until death; and by kin and descent: though the suit for land may not succeed by the first means, nor by the second, it is not to be obtained the less effectually than before by the third.

106. There are three wrong possessions: possession in opposition to the owner, against his will, and without a judgment; or, possession through the means of the owner in opposition to his heir, against his will, and without a judgment; or, possession through a guardian, and in opposition to the right owner against his will, and without a judgment: an owner is one having a sure title: a guardian is one who maintains or guards the right of another person, with his consent.

107. By three modes is a suit of daden-hudd to be resolved between heirs, that is to say, through three natural privileges: the first is, by privilege of age, between the eldest and the youngest; the second is, by privilege of marriage, between a lawful heir and one not lawful, because the lawful is to have the whole; the third is, by privilege of right, between one having a right and one without right: if, however, the fathers of those have holden the same land each in succession until death, if their sons shall come to demand daden-hudd, the son of the right owner is to get the daden-hudd entirely, at what time soever he may come: afterwards, if heirs of equal degree come together, and at the same time, to demand daden-hudd; such as brothers, in respect to their father's land; or cousins, or second cousins, in respect to their father's land, which their fathers held unshared, in succession, until they died, no one of them can oust the others, nor cause them delay, but each is to obtain his dadenhudd share: whosoever shall take his father's land before the eldest brother, the eldest brother is to oust him altogether; and he is to have his dadenhudd of all; and if the eldest shall die possessed of an unshared dadenhudd, his son next has dadenhudd of all against every body.

108. There are three kinds of privileges: natural privilege; privilege of office; and privilege of land.

109. There are three proprieties to every person: kind; privilege; and heirship: nevertheless, heirship is according to privilege, privilege is according to kind, and kind according to the distinction that may exist between persons, according to law; such as the distinction between a king and an uchelwr, a man and a woman, eldest and youngest, a breyr and a villain.

110. There are three kinds of judges in Cymru, according to the law of Howel the good: a judge of the "supreme court by virtue of office, continually with the kings of Dinevwr and Aberfraw; and one judge of a cymwd or cantrev, by virtue of office, in every court of pleas, in Gwynedd and Powys; and a judge, by privilege of land, in every court of a cymwd or cantrev, in South Wales; that is to say, every owner of land. Every official judge is to have four legal pence for every judgment, of that amount in value, from the party in whose favour he decides: a judge by privilege of his land, however, is not to have worth for his judgment; because it is a service attached to the land.

111. The time allowed to every judge to give judgment between suitors, if he want information, is fifteen days; because the period for causes ought not to be fixed for a shorter space than that: and if he be an official judge, let him then judge the cause at the time appointed, or forfeit his office to the king, without other loss: for no one is to hold an office longer than he is able to execute its duty in proper time.

112. If judges by privilege of land request time for judgment, whether from doubt, or from the absence of some of the men of the court, those who are present are to have time, without swearing; the king is to compel those who are absent, by summons through suretiship, or by the arrest of the whole of them, to appear at the second court; and whosoever of them, at that appointed time, shall neglect such summons, without fair cause, becomes liable to a camlwrw: let those present, however, judge the cause, or let them swear that they are not competent, lest they forfeit camlwrws; and at the second adjournment, in the third court, let them decide the cause, without any kind of excuse; or the king shall again arrest and keep them all in custody until they shall adjudge that cause and determine it altogether.

113. There is no other pain or penalty but compulsion, by law, for deficient service, or deficient duty, or rent to the king; unless a denial be made in opposition thereto; excepting such service as may lapse, and cannot be restored: the distress that shall be made on account of any one of these three deficiencies is not to be released until every thing has been settled respecting it.

114. Whilst there may be several "judges coequal by privilege of land in giving one decision, yet one only is to judge; that is to say, he who summed it up in the court, between the litigants, through the joint consent of the men of the court; and the rest act as counsellors to him, in his decision: and should he incur the worth of his tongue, on account of the common judgment pronounced by him for himself, and likewise for them all, in the court, the judge and all of them together are to pay the worth of his tongue in common, each one equal with the other; for, by common consent and agreement they gave the decision, and in the same manner they are to pay in common likewise, on account of their decision: in like manner, if a judge by privilege of land shall forfeit a camlwrw, on account of a decision so given, every one of his coadjutors in the same decision forfeits his equal proportion.

115. No one incurs the worth of his tongue but the judge himself, or whoever shall enter into a mutual pledge with him, when they place their two pledges, one against the other, in the hand of the king, to await the decision; that is to say, a pledge and a counter-pledge.

116. When an official judge of the court, or of a cymwd or cantrev, shall incur the worth of his tongue, he then forfeits three things: first, he forfeits his office; secondly, he forfeits the privilege of a judge, by privation of office; thirdly, the worth of his tongue.

117. Whoever shall be a judge by privilege of land, though he incur the worth of his tongue through his wrong decision, yet he does not forfeit the privilege of a judge, whilst he is possessed of the land from which he derives the privilege of adjudication: for, in whatsoever thing there may be a privilege, in that self-same thing there is an inseparable propriety, as there is an inseparable natural privilege in the body; so the propriety of the privilege of land is the propriety of land; and so the privilege of office is the propriety of office; and therefore, when an official judge is separated from his office, by the law, he also is separated from the privilege of his office.

118. The space of time for deciding a disputed judgment between two pledges given in opposition to each other into the hand of the king, is fifteen days; and it is to be decided in this manner: in the first place, the king is to hear amicably, in the court, the argument of the person who shall oppose the judge; and then the answer of the judge in his turn; and then the person who shall speak against the judge, is to produce, from a law-book, a more correct judgment than the one which the judge delivered, if he be able; and so he overcomes the judge: if he be not able, the advantage belongs to the judge; for no one can discredit the decision, in opposition to the pledge of the judge, unless he can produce a decision in written law more worthy of credit: if both arguments are found in written law, then the decision is to be referred to experienced canonists; and whichever shall appear nearest to the truth is the most worthy to be maintained in the law.

119. If any one gives a pledge against a decision given by a judge, and which he pronounced, without a book of law present; the judge has to choose whether to give a pledge against him, or suffer that opposition; or let him wait a more unexceptionable decision from written law: if he give the pledge against the other, whoever shall be worsted, let him lose the worth of his tongue; if he suffer it, although the other may prevail, the judge only forfeits a camlwrw; and if the other do not prevail, he likewise forfeits a camlwrw.

120. No judge is blameable for giving and pronouncing a judgment from a written authority, though it be not right, unless he confirm it by a pledge; but the authority is to be condemned.

121. If a judge pronounce a judgment without a law-book in the court, and do not confirm it, in the court, by a pledge, in opposition to the pledge of the other; let him pay to the king a camlwrw: and he is then to have time to give his decision anew between the suitors, and to confirm either that, or another.

122. If a judge give a false judgment between suitors, and the judgment be acquiesced in by them, in the court; and he afterwards give a right judgment in a similar suit; let him pay a camlwrw to the king, for the false judgment previously given by him: because he himself, as a credible witness, has shown, by a right judgment, that he had previously given a wrong judgment.

123. If a judge give a wrong judgment against a person, who cannot, by law, enter into a mutual pledge with him, as to his wrong judgment; yet, if he be able then, or within the period of fifteen days, to show, by books of law, against the judge, a more just written judgment, the most just is to be in force; and the judge forfeits a camlwrw.

124. There are three persons who cannot enter into a mutual pledge, by law, against a judgment: the first is, a king, for he cannot, according to law, stand in a suit before a judge, to prefer a claim or to answer, by virtue of natural privilege, or by the privilege of land, like a breyr or other person; the second is, an ecclesiastical person, bound in holy orders; the third is, an ecclesiastical person in a religious institution: since no one, by law, can give a pledge against a judgment, but under the penalty of the worth of his tongue; and there is no established worth, in the law of Hywel, for a limb, the blood, or the saraad of a clerical person; and therefore, not one of them is able to give a pledge in opposition to a judgment, nor in support of a judgment: every unworthy injury done to the clergy is to be repaired to them in the synod, according to ecclesiastical law.

125. Three things which every judge is to listen to from the litigants before deciding for either of them to gain or lose: that is to say, the complaint; the request; and the answer.

126. Whoever shall lose any thing through a void judgment may give his pledge against it when he willeth, within a year and a day, in the first year he shall obtain right from the king; and the judge who gave the judgment, abiding by the law, through ⁴the privilege of that space of time: if within that time he enter into a mutual pledge to oppose the judgment, it is necessary to repair his whole loss to him, without delay; and he is to hold that, responsible to law, until a determination be given, from books of law, ⁶between him and the judge, as to the void judgment, so that it may be known who shall overcome, or be overcome; and the judge is to restore, on the part of the king, so much as he had adjudged to the king of the property in question; and what he adjudged to others, they are to restore, without further pain, unless the complainant be obliged to complain against them, as against the judge: if the judge ⁴overcomes, let the complainant restore the whole to him; since it is not conformable with the functions of a judge to deliver a void judgment; and therefore the king is not to be responsible for the judge in respect to what he may do independently of his proper functions.

127. There are three kinds of void judgments: the first is, a judgment against a person who does not hear it, when first pronounced in the court, whether he might then be far or near; if he should be near, the apparitor ought to call him, so that he might hear the judgment that was given for him, or upon him; if he should be at a distance, he ought to be waited for, until he show himself in the court, if he could be found, to abide the law in time; the second is, a judgment pronounced upon a person present, through oppression on the part of the king, or the judge, or the men of the court; the third is, a judgment by an unqualified judge.

128. There are three persons no one of whom, by law, can be a qualified judge: one of them is, a person having a defect; as one who is deaf, or blind, or leprous, or an insane person, such is a person whom it has been necessary once to bind on account of his madness, or a person who is unable to speak perfectly, as one having a natural impediment; the second is, an ecclesiastical person, connected with holy orders, or with religion; the third is, a laic, without the qualification for judging, by law, from privilege of land, or privilege of office.

129. By three ways may a qualified judge be contravened: the first is, from his being partial in the suit, before deciding between the litigants in the court; the second is, from his being interested in the matter of the suit, if it could be gained through a judgment; the third is, taking a fee in the suit not allowed by law to a judge.

130. An ecclesiastical person cannot be compelled to answer to any one out of the synod, for misdemeanors reported of him.

131. If an ecclesiastic should hold land by title, under the king, for which service is to be performed to the king, he is to answer in the king's court, as to the land and its appurtenances; for the king is owner of all the land of the kingdom: and unless he answer obediently for the land, it shall belong to the king.

132. Although an ecclesiastic can sit in judgment, by privilege of his land, jointly with laics, until the time for passing sentence; he cannot, by law, pronounce the judgment between the litigants; as the worth of his tongue is not set down in law, by which every judge is punished, who

134. No denial is complete, until the whole raith be furnished pertaining to the suit; whether the oath of one person, or the oaths of many.

135. In a case where a raith of the country is requisite, the king is to compel the raith-men to the relic to be duly sworn, along with the denier, or against him, as they shall choose.

136. A raith of the country is ⁶the oaths of fifty men possessing land under the king.

137. Where a raith of the country is not requisite, there the denier is to get such raith-men, through his own means, as may be required of him.

138. No defence is complete, neither does it fail, until the verdict of the country be given upon it between the plaintiff and the defendant, by duly swearing that it is true, or that it is not true: and in that case also, the king is to compel his ⁸men to the relic, to swear as they may choose.

139. Where a verdict of the country is requisite, all the men of the court are to swear, excepting those whom the litigants are able to object to, by law.

IX. [OF WARRANTY.]

1. There are four shields which interpose, in the court, between the litigants and a raith of the country, or a verdict of the country: as the exonerating a guest, for reputed theft; and custody before loss; and birth and rearing in case of charge of theft, by a gwaesav, or by force, or by surreption without force and without theft. And no complete answer, nor complete exculpation, nor complete defence, is afforded by either of these three first, to such as may obtain it, but assistance, so that it may be easier to credit him, under the ⁴shield that he shall get, than without it. And so ⁴calling a guarantor is not a complete answer, nor a complete security, to the person that shall call him, but an endeavour to obtain some one who may fully answer for him, and who may bear the whole for him : and on that account, whoever shall obtain a guarantor, let them both stand together to the law, in the court, until the whole suit shall be determined, by a judgment between them and the plaintiff : for it cannot be known, by any way, before the conclusion of the judgment, whether one of them be in fault, or both of them, or whether either of them be in fault ; and it cannot be known likewise, whether the guarantor shall will to effect all for himself, and the disputed property, and for the defendant, or whether he shall not will ; and neither is it known whether he be able or not able.

2. Three things which an efficient guarantor is to do : the first is, to answer without delay, for himself, for the disputed property, and for the defendant in respect to the property ; the second is, to abide by the law, and the decision as to the whole cause, by the verdict of the country ; the third is, to accomplish every thing, as to the whole cause, that he may be adjudged to do.

3. No moveable or immoveable property can be guaranteed, that is taken contrary to law ; nor any act that is committed contrary to law, if it be manifested by a verdict of the country : a judge, however, ought to know and to understand, by a verdict of the country, whether the property has been taken, or the act has been committed by law, or contrary to law, before giving a final judgment between the plaintiff and the guarantor ; and that after the answer of the defendant.

4. Whoever shall obtain a guarantor in a cause is to have no other advocate than the guarantor in that cause ; for the guarantor ought to answer for them both ; since there is no guarantee, other than a defence, that will release.

5. Whoever may like better to have another to plead for him in the court than himself has permission to be silent, without pleading any thing, whilst he may will to employ the advocate.

6. Whoever may will to prove a fault in a cause against the 'employer of an advocate is to testify against the advocate, for no fault can be proved against the employer ; since there is permission for him, by law, to be silent during the whole cause.

7. Witnesses are to be objected to as the advocate may choose, either for galanas on his own part, or for galanas on the part of his employer ; for the testimony is against them both.

8. No cause is to be concluded by testimony to a faulty word, without the permission of the king, wherein there may pertain to him either a dirwy or 'a camlwrw' from that cause if the testimony had not been given : for, if the testimony be rejected, ¹⁹the king obtains nothing ; and if not rejected, he is to have no more than a camlwrw ¹⁸for that cause.'

X. [OF A DEPOSIT.]

1. If a guardian lose a deposit, without losing any of his own property, he is to pay the whole loss himself, by law : the book of ⁵Cynog says that it is easier to credit him, if his own property be stolen along with the other, and the breach in the house be seen ; he is, however, to swear, conjointly with the men of the house, to his being clear as to that property : if the earth, however, be excavated under the house ; after showing, in law, that he is clear, the king owns the earth, and the guardian is not to be answerable for it.

2. If a person bring property to a guardian to be kept, and some of the property be lost, and dispute and contention arise between the owner and the guardian concerning the property ; the guardian is to swear, conjointly with one person nearest to himself in worth, if he deny part and acknowledge part.

3. If any one deny a deposit, which a person shall give to keep in his hand, or house-breach ; let him give a two-fold raith : as to a back-burden, or a horse-load of deposit, it is determined ; for a horse-load of deposit, the oaths of twenty-four men are to be given ; for a back-burden, the oaths of ten men.

XI. [OF VILLAINS.]

1. The taeogs are to right the injuries committed by their sons, until they attain the age of fourteen years; and then their fathers are to commend them to the king: and they themselves, according to law, are to be answerable, after the age of fourteen years.

2. The eight packhorses of the king are: 'the sea,' the king's waste, a necessitous stranger wandering over the king's land, a thief, a marwdy, a person who dies of a sudden death, to the king belongs the share of the dead of all that property, but he is to have nothing from the share of the wife and the sons, ebediw, and dirwy and camlwrw.

3. There is one person whose house is not to be a marwdy though he may die intestate, namely, a judge of the court.

4. A judge ought to listen fully, keep in memory, learn acutely, pronounce ³mildly, and judge mercifully.

5. Once every year the king is to have hosts along with him to a border country: always, however, when it may be necessary, a host is to attend him in his own country.

6. From the taeogs the king is to have packhorses in his hosts; and from every tacog-trev the king is to have a man and horse, with hatchets for constructing his castles, at the king's cost.

7. There are nine buildings which the villains are to erect for the king; that is to say, a hall, chamber, kitchen, chapel, barn, kiln-house, stable, dog-kennel, and privy.

8. The horses of the king and the queen and the servants are to have a progress, in winter, among the king's taeogs.

9. The minstrels from another country are to have a progress among the king's villains, while waiting for their gifts from the king, if he give any.

10. Whatsoever thing shall be shown by guestmen to the taeogs, on leaving their houses, they are to pay for, if lost; except a sword, a knife, and trowsers: their horses likewise, if lost during that night, are to be paid for by the taeogs.

villain quits the maer, let him leave him four large sows, with a boar, and all the other live stock; eight erws of spring tilth, and four erws of winter tilth; the second year, and the third, let the maer act in like manner, with other villains; and afterwards let him support himself during three other years upon his own property; and then let the king relieve him by giving him other villains in the same mode.

8. Neither a maer, nor a canghellor, shall have any share of tunc, or price of land, from the king.

9. The maer and canghellor are to keep the king's waste, until he do his pleasure therewith; and they, by law, are to have the honey, fish, and the smaller wild animals: out of all the king's profit, from his villains, they are to have a third: they are to have nothing from the free men.

10. A maer is not to be a chief of a kindred, whilst he is a maer; and he is not to have an established seat in the hall of the king: he invites three persons at a banquet in the hall of the king.

11. The maer is to have a progress among the king's villains twice in the year, as one of four.

12. He is to go as one of four in a foray, along with the king's household.

13. When a person's goods are distrained by law, the maer and the canghellor are to have the heifers, the steers, and the yearlings; and of those, the maer has the share of two persons.

14. The cowyll of his daughter is three pounds.

15. Seven pounds is her agweddi.

16. The worth of the galanas of a maer is nine score and nine kine, with three augmentations; and the like for a canghellor.

17. For the sarsad of each is to be paid nine kine, and nine score of silver.

18. One pound is the ebediw of each.

19. The ebediw of a breyr is six score pence.

20. The ebediw of a king's villain, four score and ten pence.

If the stag be killed at mid-day, in the trev of a breyr, let it be kept entire until the night; and, if the huntsmen do not then come, that one is to be dealt with the same as the other. If towards the night, or in the night it shall be killed, let the breyr spread his mantle over it, and keep it so until the morning; and if the huntsmen do not then come, let the breyr act concerning it in the manner before mentioned: whoever shall thus act, as to the king's hart, killed in his trev, is not punishable, on the part of the king, by law.

4. The king's hunting is to continue until the calends of winter: thence onward, until the ninth day, the hunting is to be for the huntsmen.

5. From the calends of winter to the feast of St. John, there are no royal pieces in the king's hart: thence onward there are twelve lawful pieces in the king's hart; that is, the tongue, three pieces of the neck, the lights, the heart, the two loins, the chine, the haunch, the stomach, the nombles, the liver. Whoever shall take any one of these, without the permission of the huntsmen, becomes liable to a camlwrw: for all the pieces, if taken, three pounds are to be paid.

6. If the king's hart be killed, and concealed, a dirwy is to be paid for it: if any one shall cut it up, without concealing it, he is liable to a camlwrw, except in the case before mentioned.

7. The worth of a hart is an ox.

8. A hind is of the value of a fair cow.

9. The skin of a hart is twelve ⁴⁵legal pence in value.

10. The skin of a hind is eight pence in value.

11. The worth of a tame hart belonging to the king is a pound.

12. The worth of every pet animal of the king, or of the queen, is a pound.

13. The worth of every pet animal of a breyr, or of his wife, or of his daughter, is six score pence.

14. If a person be struck upon his head, so that the brain be seen; or if he be stabbed in his body, so that the bowels come out; or if the thigh bone, or the arm bone, of a person be broken; for each, three pounds are to be paid him, for he is in danger of his life by every one of them.

15. The following is to be paid to a wounded person, for whom it is necessary to have medical aid, besides his saraad: four pence for a pan to prepare medicaments for him; four pence for tallow; a penny for his light nightly; a penny for the food of the mediciner daily; and a penny for the food of the wounded daily.

16. Four curt pennies are to be paid to a person for every bone, taken from the upper part of the cranium, which shall sound on falling into a copper basin: for every bone, from the lower part of the cranium, he is to have four legal pence, according to the law of Howel the good.

17. The law says that the limbs of all persons are of equal worth; if a limb of the king be broken, that it is of the same worth as the limb of the villain: yet, nevertheless, the worth of saraad to the king, or to a breyr, is more than the saraad of a villain, if a limb belonging to him be cut.

18. Whoever shall pull a person's hair, let him first pay his saraad; because an attack and onset constitute saraad to a person; and a penny for every finger that touches his head, and two pence for the thumb; and a legal penny for every hair pulled by the root from his head; and twenty-four pence for the front hair.

19. A blow that a person may receive unintentionally is not saraad; but it is right, however, to compensate the blood, the wound, and the conspicuous scar, if there be such.

37. The king is to have a third of every galanas which he shall exact, and that where a kindred cannot enforce it: and, what shall be obtained of the murderer's property, from time to time, belongs to the king, by law.

38. One pound and a half is the worth of a bondman from beyond sea; if he be a native of this island, a pound is his worth: and so also, if he be maimed; or too old; or too young, that is, less than twenty years of age; a pound is his worth: also twelve pence in lieu of his saraad: six pence for three yards of white cloth, to make him a coat; three pence for trousers; a penny for buskins and gloves; one penny for a billhook, or hatchet, if he be a woodman; and one for a rope of twelve cubits length.

39. Three times is the saraad of a man whose wife shall be violated by force, or shall be taken away from him, to be augmented.

40. Whoever shall say of another, that he has done saraad to his person; if the latter shall deny it, let him do so by his own oath, without more. If he name blood, though not 'seen, or a visible bruise, he is to give an oath with two others: for the blood, or the bruise, is to be regarded in the place of witnesses.

41. The saraad of the judge of the court is nine kine, and nine score of silver: for the nine score of silver is there instead of the augmentations: his galanas is paid by nine score and nine kine, with three augmentations.

42. In this manner the augmentations are elucidated: the first augmentation is, three score kine; the second is, four score kine; the third is, a hundred and six kine, and the third of two kine: and in that manner the galanas of every Cymro is to be augmented, according to his privilege.

43. The sum of the galanas of a judge of the court, including augmentations, is four hundred and twenty-six kine, and a third of two kine; without reckoning the nine kine, which are joined above to the first nine score kine: they are not reckoned,

47. The saraad of a bondwoman is twelve pence: if she be a servant, the worth of her saraad is twenty-four pence, that is a woman who works at her needle.

48. The dirwy of a bondman, for the first theft he commits, is six score pence; for the second, one pound; for the third, he is amenable to the same law as a free man, in respect to punishment.

49. In what place soever a fugitive bondman shall be overtaken, ⁴⁹twenty-four pence, as a rescue fee, is to be paid on his account; and four pence for every cymwd he shall have passed over: if he go to another kingdom, twenty-four pence shall be paid in hand to any one that shall release him; and out of that the captor is to retain a third; and the owner of the land is to have the two parts.

50. Whoever shall cause the pregnancy of the bondwoman of another person, is to procure another woman to serve in her stead, until she shall be delivered; and, after her delivery, the father is to rear the issue; and, if that bondwoman shall die in giving birth to that issue, let him who caused her pregnancy pay her legal worth to her lord.

51. Whoever shall have connexion with a bondwoman without the consent of her lord, let him pay twelve pence to her lord for every repetition.

XVIII. [OF WOMEN.]

1. If a man take a wife by gift of kindred, and he desert her before the end of the seven years; let him pay her three pounds, as her agweddi, if she be the daughter of a breyr; and one pound and a half, as her cowyll; and six score pence, as her gobyr;
if she be the daughter of a taeog, one pound and a half, as her agweddi; six score pence, as her cowyll; and twenty-four pence, as her gobyr.

2. If, after the seven years, he leave her;
let all be shared between them, unless privilege should give precedence to the husband: two parts of the children go to the husband, and the third to the mother; the eldest and the youngest go to the father.
If they be separated by death, let every thing be equally shared between them.

3. The saraad of a married woman is to be compensated to her according to the privilege of her husband: that is, according to the privilege of the man to whom she may be given.

4. A man is free to forsake his wife, if she notoriously attach herself to another man; and she is to obtain nothing of her right, excepting the three things which are not to be taken from a woman; and the seducer is to pay to the lawful husband his saraad.

5. If a wife utter a harsh, or disgraceful word to her husband; let her pay to the husband three kine as caml⁵²wr⁵³u, for he is her lord; or, let him strike her three blows, with a rod of his cubit length, on any part he may will, excepting her head.

6. If a man beat his wife without cause, let him pay her saraad to her, according to her privilege.

7. If a woman desert her husband's bed without cause; let her pay him three kine as camlwrw, before he takes her back.

8. If a man separate from his lawful wife, she being pregnant; the time is to be reckoned, from the day of ^etheir separation, for her to rear the issue she may be pregnant with; for, according to this law, the mother is to nurse the issue during a year and a half; and after that the mother is not to nurse it any more. If she be found to be a violated maid, without denial, her smock is to be cut before and behind; and then the man is to give her a steer, with its tail greased; and, if she be able to hold it by its tail, let her take it for her agweddi.

9. If a married man be killed, his saraad is to be first paid, and then his worth: the third of his saraad, however, the wife is to have.

10. If the daughter of a breyr go with a man clandestinely, with her own consent; when deserted, her agweddi is to be ^esix bullocks, whose horns are of equal length with their ears: to the daughter of a taeog, in a similar case, three bullocks, ^ewith their horns and ears of equal length, are to be paid.

11. The wife of a free man can give her mantle, her shift, her shoes, her headcloth, her meal, her cheese, her butter and her milk, without the advice of her husband; and she can lend all the furniture. The wife of a taeog is to give nothing, without the permission of her husband, but her head-gear; and she can lend nothing, but her sieve; and that only for the distance her call may be heard, with her foot on her threshold.

12. A woman is to have from the father of the child for rearing it, for so long a period as before described, a coat of the value of four pence; a choice cow; a pan of the value of a penny ^ehalfpenny; and a car-load of the best corn that shall grow upon the father's land: and that pertains to the taeogs.

13. The son of a boneddig is to be reared in this manner: the mother of the boy originally bears him nine months in her womb; and during three months after he is born, she is to nurse him; and that is to be reckoned for a year to her: after that the father is to rear him, and procure for him all his necessaries: first, he is to give a sheep, with her fleece and her lamb; and then a caul of tallow, or a penny; and an iron pan, or four legal pence; and a menaid of wheat to make pap for him; and a car-load, drawn by two oxen, of fuel; and two ells of white or party-coloured cloth, to put around the child; and a milch cow,

with her calf; and three car-loads of wheat, barley, and oats; and three car-loads of fuel: if the mother will, she shall have the whole; if she do not will, let it be given to another.

14. If a pure virgin go away clandestinely, without the advice of her kindred; her father can bring her back from her husband, against her will, and she loses nothing of her right from him who took her away; neither does her father pay her amobyr to the lord.

15. If a woman, however, go away clandestinely, against the will of her kindred, no one can bring her back, against her will,
from the man: according to the place of her abode, her amobyr is to be paid.

16. A woman who shall be taken away clandestinely, and who makes no contract, in the presence of witnesses, for obtaining her full right; is to have, according to the men of Gwynedd, only three bullocks; according to the men of the South, she formerly obtained her agweddi in full, the same as a woman whom her kindred had given to a man.

17. Whoever shall carry away a maid clandestinely, and the maid say: 'How much wilt thou give me?' And he then say: 'I will give thee so much;' and confirm that on his faith, and over relics: if he deny 'after that,' let her take the relics, and swear to his having promised her so much: and, in that case, he can say nothing in opposition to her; for her own testimony is to be credited in that matter.

20. It is not enacted in the law of Howel the good, that a man is to be castrated for violating a woman.

21. For three causes, if a woman desert her husband, she is not to lose her agweddi: for leprosy; want of connexion; and bad breath.

22. Three times a woman is to obtain her wyneb-werth: the first time, she is to have six score pence; the second time, one pound; the third time, she can leave her husband, and depart with all her due: but if she endure beyond the third time, she is not to obtain her wyneb-werth.

23. If a maiden do not settle the uses of her cowyll before rising in the morning out of bed from her husband; it is to remain in common from that time forward.

24. If a maiden, arrived at a state of puberty, be given to a man; and he then shall assert that she was not a maid; let the maid swear with four of the persons nearest of kin to her; that is to say, she, her father, her mother, her brother, and her sister, to its being a falsehood; and that she had come to him a maid, of the age indicating the common signs of puberty, and having attained the teithi of a woman of full age. If he keep silence in the first instance, and have connexion with her the second time, and sleep with her until the morning; though he might have found her a woman the first time, he cannot withhold from her any of her maiden rights. If, immediately that he shall find that, he rise up to the bridal men, and declare to that effect; unless she shall deny it against him, he testifying the fact to the men, she is to obtain nothing of her right.

second scandal, the oaths of fourteen women; upon the third scandal, the oaths of fifty women: if there be any kind of foundation for the scandal.

26. If a woman be given to a man, the man is to be responsible for her ⁵gwaddol until the end of the seven years: and, if she attain three nights of the seventh year, the wife is to have half of the entire property, when they separate; and the property is to be shared in this manner: the husband is to have the swine, and the wife the sheep. Afterwards, the wife is to share, and the husband is to choose; excepting that the household utensils are to be thus shared: all the milk vessels to the wife, saving one ⁴pail, the ⁴dishes, saving one ⁴dish; and the one pail, and the one dish, the husband is to have: the husband, likewise, is to have the car, and one of the teams; all the liquor vessels; and all the tubs; and what shall be ⁴under them of the bed clothes; what shall be upon them of the bed clothes belong to the wife: if the husband, upon that occasion, take another wife, he must send the first-mentioned bed clothes to the wife who is rejected. The husband is to have the boiler, the quilt or the plaid, and the bolster; the coulter, the fuel-hatchet, the auger, the small auger, the iron hob, all the hooks save one, and the baking-girdle. The wife is to have the trivet, the pan, the broad axe, the sieve, the plough-share, with one hook; the flax and flaxseed, the wool, and all the trinkets, excepting gold or silver; these, if there be any, are to be equally shared between them: and so the linen and woollen webs are to be shared between them. The husband is to have the barn, with the corn that may be on the earth, or in the earth; the fowls, and the ⁴cat; and, if there be ⁴others, the wife is to have them. The ⁴wife is to have the flesh, in brine and out of brine; and the like as to the cheese, in brine and out of brine. The husband is to have the flesh in cut; and all the cheese that is raised up; all the vessels of butter in cut; the bacon in cut; and the cheese in cut. The wife is to have as much meal as she can bear between her hands, above her knees, from the store-room to the house.

27. Each is to have his own clothes; only that the mantles are to be shared.

28. If a man deserts his wife unlawfully, and takes another; the rejected wife is to remain in her house until the end of the ninth day; and then, if she be suffered to depart entirely from her husband, every thing belonging to her is to go in the first place out of the house; and then she is to go last out of the house, after all her property: after that, on bringing the other into the house, he is to give "dilysdawd" to the first wife; because no man, by law, is to have two wives.

29. Whoever shall leave his wife, and shall repent leaving her, she having been given to another husband; if the first husband overtake her with one foot in the bed, and the other out; the first husband, by law, is to have her.

30. If a wife deny her adultery, let her give the oaths of fifty women; and, in like manner, the husband, who shall deny his adultery, is to give the oaths of fifty men: and this raith is to be given for the three strong scandals.^b

31. If a wife be guilty of an odious deed along with another man, whether by kiss, aut coitu, aut palpando, the husband can repudiate her; and she is to forfeit the whole of her right for giving a kiss, without either of the others.

32. If a man have connexion with the wife of another, he is to pay "him his" saraad, once augmented; because it causes family animosity.

33. Pro palpando, saraad is to be paid ^bwithout augmentation.

affiliated to another father, and the lord of the father she is affiliated to willeth an amobyr on account of the husband she had before being affiliated to the new father, and she being a worthless daughter; he that requires her amobyr is not to have it for three causes: that a woman owes but one amobyr; the second cause is, that she did not marry after affiliation to her new father; the third cause is, whatever she did during her abode with a former stock is not to constitute a claim or surclaim against her in the stock she enters; unless she did not pay her amobyr to the lord of her former father, for the union is not complete unless the amobyr be paid, and therefore it is right to finish and unite, and pay the amobyr to the lord of the new father.

49. A wife never pays but one amobyr by law, and she pays it from the privilege of the land she originates from; and she alone is to pay it, unless she be given by her father, or her brother, or by one of her kindred, to a husband; and, if he shall not take surety for her amobyr, he is to pay it himself, as he omitted taking surety. Whoever shall violate a woman let him pay her amobyr. The cause that a woman pays but one amobyr is, that she never returns to the privilege of the lord of the land, nor to the privilege of her kindred, but acquires the privilege of the husband she obtains.

50. Of a virgin-wife: that is a woman given to a man, and she a virgin, the marriage being unconsummated: if she be violated, some say that the whole is not due, others say it is; we, however, say, that whoever shall violate her virginity is to pay her her cowyll.

51. Whoever shall cause the pregnancy of a female of bush and brake: she is not, after her delivery, to rear the offspring but for the swaddling month: the cause is, as she received none of the substance of the man, the law does not see it right for her to suffer want on his account.

52. If a virgin be violated, and, in consequence of that violation, she become pregnant, and she know not who the father may be; and the lord willeth an amobyr for her, and she say it is not due, for she was violated; and no woman violated is to pay an amobyr: the law there says, the amobyr is extinguished as to the lord, for he could not preserve her from the violation, it being incumbent upon him to preserve her against illegality. If her violation be doubted, let her oath be taken that her testimony is true, and upon that she is credible: the son of such a female is adjudged to be on the privilege of his mother's kindred until it shall be known who his father may be.

Two women whose privilege does not progress with the privilege of their husbands: these are, a bondwoman although she may have children by a Cymro, or may be taken clandestinely by a Cymro, the owner of the bondwoman can recover her when he will, as he may his animal; and therefore the privilege of bondage is stronger than that of concubinage: if the man who shall have taken her should marry her without the consent of the uchelwr the privilege of marriage is stronger than that of bondage; from thenceforward she is to remain on the privilege of the man she shall marry, and her husband is to pay her legal worth to the lord, or a bondwoman equal to her: the second is, a married female, separated from her husband, either during his life, or by his death, and then renouncing the world, and becoming a nun or under other vows; the law says, that if she suffer saraad she does not rank according to the privilege of her former husband, but according to that of the church.

54. Three women whose husbands are not to have right from them for their adultery: one is, a woman taken clandestinely; if she do what she may please with another man, she is not to do right to the man who took her clandestinely: the second is, a woman slept with as a concubine, and that publicly known; though she do what she may please, the man she slept with is to receive no right: the third is, a woman of bush and brake; her paramour is to receive no right from her, though she may commit fornication by taking another paramour.

ELUCIDATED.

1. The claimant, in the first place, is to exhibit his claim; and after that, the defendant his defence; and in respect thereto, the elders of the country are to consult together ⁶amicably, which of the parties allows the truth, and which does not; and after the elders shall have considered their opinion, and supported their proceeding by oath; the ⁴judges are to withdraw aside to deliberate, according to the proceeding of the elders, and inform the king what they shall have adjudged: and that is a verdict of the country after replication; and in that manner is a suit concerning land determined.

2. When a dispute shall be commenced concerning boundaries of lands, or trevs; if it be commenced between land of the court and land of the community, the court is to meer; if between church land

6. Three cases wherein the law shares:
the one before explained is the first; the second is, when the property is shared between the husband and the wife, on account of the decease of either of them; the third is, when an animal, or any thing else, is taken from an illegal condition to a legal one.

7. There are to be three hundred and breadth.

9. There are to be seven trevs in a low-land maenor; thirteen trevs in an upland maenor.

10. The king is to have half a pound when a boundary is set out between two trevs; and the judges twenty-four pence.

11. The king is to have half a pound from every randir that is adjudged by law to a person.

12. When a trev is adjudged to a person, to which there is office attached, the king is to have one pound and a half from him.

XXI. OF SUIT OF DADENHUDD.

1. Whoever shall demand dadenhudd of land that had been held by his father, until his death, through possession by tillage, is entitled to dadenhudd of the whole; unless there be issue from the body of his father, having a priority of right, or of equal privilege with him, holding the land, in opposition to him; or, conjointly with him, demanding dadenhudd, in the court. And then the party is to remain stationary, without answering to any one as to the land, until the time of reaping arrive, and he turn his back upon the rick, unless there shall come the eldest brother, and the most entitled; if one more entitled than himself come, such is to have the whole; if one having equal right shall come, he is to have an equal share.

2. If dadenhudd by car be adjudged to a person, by his coming with a car upon the land; he shall remain there during nine days; and upon the ninth day he is to give an answer; and upon the second ninth day, judgment.

3. If by dadenhudd, with a back-burthen, he come to the land held formerly by his father until his death; he shall rest three days and three nights; and on the third day he shall answer to the person who may sue him; and on the ninth day judgment.

4. Whoever shall have dadenhudd adjudged to him, no one, by law, can eject him therefrom, except a proprietary heir to dadenhudd, according to age, that is to say, the eldest; since the second dadenhudd cannot eject the first; and one non-proprietor cannot eject another non-proprietor. And, if there be a dispute between two ⁴lawful heirs, one cannot eject the other, by law. Of the two lawful present heirs, one is proprietary heir to dadenhudd of the whole, and another is non-proprietor; the one, however, is proprietor to dadenhudd of the whole, as dadenhudd of the whole is not appropriate to any one, but to the eldest of all the brothers. The privilege of age of the eldest brother renders all the younger brothers non-proprietors, and renders him sole proprietor for dadenhudd of all; if the younger ones come before him to obtain the dadenhudd, at what time soever he may come, he is to eject them all, and is to obtain dadenhudd of the whole: if they make the demand jointly, they are to obtain it jointly, as has been mentioned above. The eldest brother is likewise a primary son, and the youngest is secondary in claim; and therefore it is said: the second dadenhudd cannot eject the first. All the younger brothers are non-proprietors, as to obtaining dadenhudd of the whole, although every one shall obtain his share; and on that account it is said: no non-proprietor can eject another non-proprietor.

3. No person is to demand re-sharing but the one who has not obtained a share by choosing: thence the proverb: there is no choice in what is settled.

4. No person is to obtain the land of a co-heir, as of a brother, or of a cousin, or of a second cousin, by claiming it as heir to that one co-heir who shall have died, without leaving an heir of his body; but by claiming it as heir to one of his own parents, who had been owner of that land until his death without heir, whether a father, or grandfather, or great grandfather; that land he is to have, if he be the nearest of kin to the deceased.

5. After brothers shall have shared their patrimony between them, if one of them die, without leaving an heir of his body, or co-heir, to a third cousin, the king is to be the heir to that land.

6. As a brother is rightful heir to his patrimony, so is his sister rightful heir to her gwaddol, through which she may obtain a husband entitled to land; that is to say, from her father, or from her co-inheritors, if she remain under the guidance of her parents, and her co-inheritors.

7. If an owner of land have no other heir than a daughter, the daughter is to be heiress to the whole land.

8. If an owner of land have a legitimate heir, and another that is illegitimate; the legitimate is to inherit the whole, and the illegitimate without a share.

9. If an owner of land have an heir without bodily blemish, and another who is blemished, such as one who is blind, or deaf, or crippled; the unblemished is to be heir to the whole land, whether he be legitimate, or illegitimate; for no one who is blemished can fully accomplish the service of the land due to the king, in the courts, and in the armies: and if that blemished heir have unblemished issue, such one is to be the heir to his patrimony.

10. Whoever shall accept the title to land of a blemished person becomes bound to provide that blemished person with food and clothing whilst he lives.

11. If a person neglect three summonses, on the part of the king, in respect to land, and does not appear to answer to him who makes a demand, the claimant is to be put into possession of it: if, for lawful cause, he remained without coming, he is to have possession of his land. If he should contemn the first summons, and appear to the second, or to the third; so many summonses as he shall contemn, so many camlwrws he is to pay to the king: nevertheless, he is not to fail in his cause; but, if the law so adjudge, let him answer.

12. No person is to lose his land, on account of a faulty word, until it shall occur three times.

13. Whoever shall pay 'cynhasedd' for land, is not, by right, to pay an ebediō when he shall die: ¹²cynhasedd is, investiture fee.

14. If there be land among a family unshared, and they should all die, excepting one person, that one person is to have all that land in common; and, if he should be unable to render the full services for that land, let the land vest in the king until he can render service for it.

15. If a person claim land by kin and descent, he is not to be heard, until the elders of the country shall swear that he is descended from the family stock that may hold the land.

16. Whoever shall hold land to which he is not entitled, in the same cymwd, or in the same cantrev, with ¹⁶those who are entitled to it, during three lives of ancestors on both sides, peaceably; and without agitation of claim, respecting it, in the court, without burning of house, without breaking of plough, in seeking law; he is not bound to answer to those, in respect thereto, after the three lives; because the law is closed between them.

17. Whoever shall suffer his patrimony, or his maternity, to be given to another, in his presence, peaceably, without interdiction, without gainsaying; although he should claim it, he is not to be listened to, by law, during his life; his heirs, however, are to have it, if they claim it legally.

18. The law does not bar the king from claiming his rightful land in a less period than a hundred years.

19. After there shall have been a sharing of land acquiesced in by co-inheritors, no one of them has a claim on the share of the other, he having issue, except for a sub-share, when the time for that shall arrive. Yet, whosoever shall not have any issue of his body, his co-inheritors, within the three degrees of kin from the stock, are to be his heirs.

20. No one, by law, can guarantee land to another, in opposition to the heirs, except for their common benefit, or by their accordance, or from lawful necessity; nor grant any part of it for a time, without an appointed period, so that the heirs may redeem it, if given for a valuable consideration, or from necessity; and that it be not charged with more than two thirds of its worth: and, if it be not so settled, the heir may recover it whenever he shall claim it, if he can lawfully answer for it.

21. Whoever shall obtain his rightful land, through proceedings in court, and by judgment, and which he could not otherwise obtain, is not to pay "prid" for it; and is not to restore any of the moveable property, that he shall find upon the land, to the holder.

22. Whoever shall dwell upon the land of another person, without his permission, during three days and three nights; all the moveable property of such is to belong, without obstacle, to the owner of the land, if he find it upon the land.

23. There are three kinds of prid on land: one is, a conservancy fee; the second is, what shall be given towards augmenting of land, or its privilege; the third is, lawful labour done upon the land, whereby the land is improved.

24. If a person seek to obtain a share of land from his relations, after having been long in a foreign country; let him give them six score pence as a conservancy fee, if they permit him to have a share without plaint.

25. Whoever shall commit treason against his lord, or waylay, is to forfeit his patrimony; and, if caught, he is liable to be hanged; but, if not caught, and he will to be reconciled to the kindred and to the lord, a twofold payment of dirwy and galanas is to be levied upon him: and if he repair to the court of the pope, and return which shall not belong to him, is to have the third of the fish; and the two parts go to the proprietor of the river.

34. No one is to obtain chiefship of a kindred, nor principal homestead upon land, nor office by privilege of land, on the part of the mother, although he shall be permitted to have a share of land, if there be any one on the part of the father entitled thereto: it is more appropriate, however, that a person on the part of the mother should have them, than that they should be obtained by a stranger.

35. If a woman connect herself with a man without the advice of her kindred; the children whom she may bear to him are not to have a share of land from the kindred of their mother, according to law.

36. If parents, or kindred, give a destitute woman to an alltud; her children, by the alltud, are to have a share of land from their mother's kindred; but no one of them is to have a principal seat until the third descent. And for that sort of conjunction it is held that cattle without surety are to be paid on account of galanas; and no suretiship is required for them, in this way; if the son of the alltud, by that wife, kill a person, the kindred of his mother pay for the murdered; since the alltud has no kindred upon whom a galanas can be levied, or revenge exercised.

37. If a ship be wrecked upon the land of a bishop, the proceeds are to be shared between the king and the bishop: if it should be wrecked upon the land of the king himself, the proceeds belong to the king.

38. Whatever may be cast upon land by a sea storm, such as the wreck of a ship, belongs to the king.

39. Whoever shall refuse to abide by law, in court, in the presence of the king, is liable to confiscation of property; the second person subject to confiscation is, a fugitive; the third is, a person who shall kill a fellow countryman.

40. Whoever shall deface a mark upon a mere between two lands, or between two trevs; let him pay a camlwrw to the king; and four legal pence to the owner: and let him restore the mark to its former state.

XXV. [OF CORN DAMAGE.]

1. From the time corn is put into the ground until it go into the sheaf, money payment is to be made for it; afterwards a sound sheaf instead of a damaged sheaf.

2. For every horse on which there shall be a shackle, or a fetter, a penny is to be paid in the day, and two in the night; if it be unrestrained, however, a halfpenny in the day, and a penny the night: if the horse be entirely freed of restraint by the taker, when caught upon the corn, let him pay three kine camlwrw to the king; if, however, the 'fetter be upon 'one foot, he forfeits nothing.

3. For every fold bullock, a halfpenny in the day, and a penny in the night.

4. Out of the legal herd of swine, let him catch any sow he may choose, excepting one of the three principal swine, and keep it, from one meal time to the other;
and then let him offer it, in the presence of witnesses, to the owner; and, unless he free it from its legal impoundment, let the holder appropriate it.

5. Out of the legal flock of sheep, a sheep is to be taken, and a farthing for every five head, to the extent of a legal flock.

6. The amount of the legal herd of swine is, twelve animals and a boar.

7. The amount of the legal flock of sheep is, thirty animals and a ram.

8. For every lamb, a hen egg is to be paid, to the extent of the legal flock; and then a lamb out of them is to be paid.

9. For the goats and the kids there is to be a similar rule.

10. Whoever shall find geese in his corn, let him cut a stick, as long as from his elbow to the end of his little finger, and as thick as he may will, and let him kill the geese, in the corn, with the stick; and those he may kill out of the corn, let him pay for.

I. HENCEFORWARD THE PRACTICES ARE TO BE SPOKEN OF.

1. There are three practices of law : the first is, maintenance of a lawful day to commence a suit ; such as the ninth day of May or the calends of winter, for a suit respecting land and soil, which shall be claimed by kin and descent ; or a ⁹ninth day to re-establish a dormant suit ; that is to say, within a year and a day from the time it shall be commenced.

2. The second practice is, maintenance of a lawful mode of procedure in investigation in court, as the men of the court and the judges may choose, whether by word after word, or by turn after turn ; for the men of the court are to sum up every suit for record before judgment ; and, after that, the judges are to judge, and to recapitulate the suit and the judgment when it may be necessary.

3. Every record of court and every verdict of country are by the swearing outright of the recorders, and the swearing of such as join with them, according to their consciences.

4. Record of court and verdict of country are of equal force, but they do not pertain to the same kind of matter : a record of court is concerning what has occurred in the presence of the court ; a verdict of country exhibits the truth in court in respect to what has occurred out of the cognizance of the court.

5. The third practice is, maintenance of a lawful time to give effect and consistency to a cause ; such as a time for testifying ; or, for abrogating defunct testimony ; or, for objecting to living testimony ; or, for calling forward evidences ; or, for contravening them ; or, for objecting to them ; or, a time for mutually pledging as to judgment.

6. The time for testifying is, when the suit has been closed against the claimant ; if any part of the claim be left without being denied or defended ; or, if the claimant, or the defendant, should speak any thing wrongly, or unlawfully : if either of them shall speak a wrong word towards the other, it pertains not to question him as to that, but to testify against him immediately: every testimony is defunct excepting those specified.

7. Whoever shall will to object to defunct testimony, let him proceed against him who shall testify it.

8. Whoever shall will to object to living testimony, let him proceed against the witnesses, in the first place, upon their words; then, after their oaths, let him swear that each is no lawful witness against him, and let him specify the cause, and let him say that the witness has sworn falsely; and let him testify to two men that the witness did not deny the cause of objection: and those two men are called counter-witnesses; and they are unobjectionable.

9. The calling forward of evidences is to be at such time as he who shall call them may will, whether before denial and defence, or afterwards; for it is what took place before the suit they are to prove between the litigants.

10. Contravening of evidences is when they shall first appear against the defendant for these causes: for manifest perjury; or, for public or private spoil; or, for breaking the peace; or, for being excommunicated by name; or, for evident enmity against the defendant; and such like; and that before they revert to their recollection: if he be not able to contravene them lawfully, let them after that be objected to as witnesses; for enmity; or, for adultery; or, for landfeud; in the manner mentioned above in the book.

11. The time for mutually pledging as to judgment is, when the judgment is first given in the suit; that is to say, before the commencement of another cause, and passing it peaceably. Whoever shall neglect that time of mutually pledging, whether the judge against the suitor, or the suitor against the judge; he can never after that enter into mutual pledge, according to law; neither the judge in support of his judgment, nor the suitor in opposition to his judgment; unless it be a void judgment.

12. Whoever shall not know the practice of law cannot practise the law.

13. There are three maxims, according to the law ⁴⁴of Howel the good, to complete the law and its practice perfectly, so that they cannot be condemned for omission, or for superfluity, or for any thing unworthy: the first is, in similarities, a similar judgment is to be given; the second is, of two written laws, one contrary to the other, explanatory of the same thing, that which is more reasonable than the other is to be maintained; the third is, every kind of written law, to which there is nothing written in opposition, is to be preserved; until the sovereign and his country agree to abrogate it, and establish another, more perfect, in its place.

14. When the defendant and the judge shall enter into a mutual pledge on both sides in opposition to a decision, if the judge be able to show his decision in written law, or a precedent, so that the defendant may not be able to show another in opposition thereto, more appropriate, in written law, the judge obtains the advantage; if otherwise, he is worsted.

15. No defence will stand good, neither will it avail the defendant, unless it be timely in the suit according to record of court, and true according to verdict of country; and shall be appropriate, according to law, against the claimant in the suit, to what shall be said.

16. Every denial, however, by swearing fully, is sufficient for the denier and a raithman, peradventure it be true; for justice and law cannot be concurrent in every case, although they may frequently concur.

17. Whoever shall say that the king, or any one on his part, either by privilege of office, or other privilege, has committed oppression, contrary to law, towards him; he is to have a verdict of country, without delay, concerning it; and, if the verdict of country certify that to be true, he is to be immediately righted: and that is the chief general institute between the lord and his subjects, as a protection against the power of a lord.

18. Whoever shall deny galanas, with its accessaries, without acknowledging aught, is to give the oaths of fifty men: and he is to give the same if any one of them be denied.

19. Whoever shall deny fighting, where no person is killed, is, according to the magnitude of the saraad, to give his raith.

20. If a person be maimed through fighting; if it be denied, the oaths of fifty men are to be given.

21. If there be blood, or a bruise: blood from the head to the breast, is to be denied by the oaths of three men; from the head to the waist, it is to be denied by the oaths of six men; from the head to the ground, it is to be denied by the oaths of nine men:

III. NOW PROVING JUDGES.

1. Are there two brothers entitled to no more than one? There are: if two sons be born to a woman at one birth, those are only entitled to the share of one heir.

2. Is there any case where time shall be adjudged, and a person executed having theft in hand without a lawful arddelw? There is: if a woman be pregnant, she is to have time until she be delivered of her issue; and, although she may not avouch her pregnancy, the lord is to take care that two lives be not taken for theft committed by one person.

3. Is there any case where a son cannot demand land and soil of which his father was owner, the father having disposed of it without the consent of the son or without one of the three lawful necessities? There is: if the owner of land should have assigned or given his land to another, before he had a heir of his body, and after that marry a woman and beget a heir; such heir is not to demand the land that went from the hand of the father before his birth.

4. Is there any case where the father is to pay galanas, and his son is not to pay? There is: a fifth cousin is to pay galanas, and his son is not.

5. Is there a child whom it may be necessary either to deny, or to receive, without his being first affiliated? There is: the child of a dumb woman; since she cannot affiliate it during her life to its father, his kindred allowing the child to be related to them, therefore it is necessary to receive it, or to deny it, without being affiliated.

kindred, whose privilege he previously participated in, is bound, along with him, to pay that galanas: and, in that case, a stranger is bound to pay equally with a brother or a cousin.

19. Is there any acknowledged surreption for which there is no penalty? There is: if a person have property conjointly with another, without cross without restriction upon it, and he consume it; there is not to be imposed upon him either dirwy, or camlwrw; the person is only to regain the property: and this is an acknowledged surreption, for which there is to be no 'dirwy.

20. Is there any person the worth of whose hand is more than that of his life? There is: a bondman.

21. Is there any woman whose father is to pay ebediw, and she not to pay amobyry? There is: a woman upon whom a rape is committed.

22. Is there any person who is to have galanas without sharing with the kindred? There is: a lord, for an idiot from infancy, and rejected; there galanas is paid to the lord without participation.

23. Is there any case where a raith shall be adjudged upon a person for theft in hand, and the owner prepared to swear to it as far as the law shall allow him? There is: when a blind person shall lose property, and overtake it; then a raith is adjudged for 'it, for he cannot swear, as he cannot see.'

24. Is there any case wherein a person is to be put to death for theft in hand, although having a guarantor? There is: if a person call a priest, or any other religious man, as a guarantor, and he should be ready to receive the thing stolen from his hand; it is not to be given to him, 'he being invested with holy orders: and this is the case wherein a person is to be put to death for theft, although having a guarantor.'

25. Is there any case where the accessory is to pay more than the murderer? There is: if a person kill a bondwoman, and there be an accessory thereto; the

26. Is there any case wherein a son is, by law, to be lord over his father? There is: if an uchelwr should give his daughter to his own alltud, and they have male children; and afterwards the uchelwr die, and the sons of the alltud obtain the land of their grandfather by maternity; such will be lords over their father.

27. Is there any case wherein a steward shall suffer saraad, and his saraad shall be less than nine kine? There is: if a bondman do saraad to a free man, then the saraad is less; because the hand of the bondman is only to be cut off, or six kine, and six score of silver instead of it.

28. Is there any land the punishment for ploughing which shall be equal to that for meer-breach? There is: if there be a contention between two parties concerning land, and the lord interdict the land until the contention be ended; and, maugre that interdiction, one of the persons make use of the land; the punishment for ploughing is equal to that for meer-breach.

29. Is there any case where a non-proprietor is to eject a proprietor from his proprietorship, by law? There is: if a person kill another, and a galanas fall upon him, and there be no means of paying the galanas otherwise than by spear penny; it is right to pay the land as blood-land; and there the non-proprietor ejects the proprietor from his proprietorship: and there is the single case where a father can appropriate his son's due without his permission.

30. Is there any galanas to which there is not an accessary? There is: if an animal kill a person, that is the slayer to whom there is no accessary.

31. Is there any murderer who is not to pay galanas? There is: if a bondman kill a boneddig, there is to be no galanas, other than the life of that bondman: and there is the murder for which galanas is not paid, since the worth of the criminal is not equal to the galanas of the boneddig.

32. Is there any animal which is always subject to teithi? There is: a constant brimming sow.

34. Is there any person whose hand is worth more than his life? There is: a bondman.

35. Is there any case where a person is to forfeit a camlwrw on account of the failure of his own property? There is: if an aillt keep a bull, and it fail when needed by a neighbour, the owner is subject to camlwrw, if complaint be made against him.

36. Is there any animal against which meadow-land is closed at all times? There is: a sow.

37. Is there any case wherein the worth of a bondman or an alltud, is equal to that of the king or a breyr? There is: if a bondman or an alltud, be taken as hostage for a king or a breyr; because the person given as hostage is of the same worth, in law, with him for whom he shall be given.

38. Is there any case where there shall be an equal division through wrong possession? There is: if a non-proprietor become a proprietor of land, and the old proprietor, his proprietary title not being extinguished, prefer a plaint of wrong possession against him for the land; then it is right to share the land equally between them, on account of the non-proprietor becoming a proprietor, and because that the proprietary title of the proprietor has not become extinct; the law understanding that neither of them can oust the other from his proprietorship: and there is the only place where an equal division is to take place through wrong possession; because there is only loss of the whole, or gain of the whole, except in that one instance.

39. Is there a payer not to pay, and a surety not to compel, and a claimant to forfeit life? There is: if a person promise payment to another ²⁷for a criminal act, such as for' killing a man; and give surety for that payment, and the crime be committed, and the person refuse payment; and the man come, who committed the crime, and sue the surety, ²⁸and each of them

41. A witness is the person to whom the discourse shall be testified, that shall be spoken in his presence.

42. None are evidences except the persons who shall see in their own presence what they shall be instructed to say.

43. The oath of guardians is, to the extent the counsel shall instruct them to say, swearing that every point is true.

44. The oath of evidences is, knowing and seeing what they shall be instructed to say.

45. The oath of a witness is, to testify as to the defect previously testified to him, after claim and rejoinder.

46. The oath of a nod-man is, ¹⁶by the inducement of the owner of the raith, to be similar to what the malefactor shall have sworn before.

47. The oath of another raith-man is, ¹⁰without inducement, that it appears to him most likely that what the accused shall swear before him in that cause is the truth.

48. The oath of a malefactor is, to deny, by God and the relic, to the extent of the charge against him, ²⁴in what may pertain to that cause by record and judgment of the judge in opposition to presumption.

upon the ground : for each of those three the person must obtain a lawful arddelw to clear himself of the theft.

4. Every cause according to its contract : it is not a contract without contract-men : a contract is to be abjured like suretiship.

5. No one is to make a contract for another without his permission ; nor a father for his son ; nor a son for his father : since a contract only lasts during the life of him who makes it.

6. Although a contract be made in opposition to law, yet it is to be observed.

7. A contract annuls 'a custom.'

8. A contract is stronger than justice.

9. The oath of one person abjures a contract that has no contract-men.

10. Whoever shall break a contract and repent, and call for the contract to be kept anew, he cannot by law ; for whoever discards a thing, howsoever binding, whether contract or other thing, has no claim to it afterwards, for he broke the contract and discarded it ; the person with whom the contract was broken may claim the contract, for he neither broke the contract nor discarded it, and therefore he is to have the contract back.

11. If one person promise property to another, in the presence of witnesses, and afterwards be desirous of denying it ; he cannot deny it, unless the other's witnesses should fail.

12. By three ways a distaff acquires the privilege of a spear : one is, through sufferance, for sufferance annuls every plea ; the second is, for want of a lawful male heir ; the third is, by the purchase of the property, for that is the third lawful inheritance.

13. Neither justice nor law ought to be without these four essentials : a common lord ; a presiding judge ; and two parties present.

14. The teithi of violence : a cry ; a horn ; and a complaint.

15. Seven legal qualities which a judge ought to possess : to be,

16. If a person be found burning a house stealthily, and be laid hold of, let his life be forfeited.

17. There is to be no galanas for a thief: and there is no recrimination to take place between two kindred on account of his being put to death.

18. If an accusation of the crime of burning, openly or stealthily, be brought against a person, he is to give the oaths of fifty men; if his raith be had, let him be free; if he do not get it, let him be a saleable thief.

19. If there should arise a contention between two persons as to the procuring a relic to swear by; and one say: 'It is for thee to procure the relic:' and the other: 'Thou art to procure the relic:' this law says, that the person to whom the procuration of the oath pertains is to procure the relic, for he is to bring the relic he may choose to be made use of.

20. There is to be no galanas for traitors to a lord, and thieves, and ferocious persons, and every person whose life is forfeited by sentence of law.

21. Ferocious men, if they deny their savage violence; their denial is twofold to that of theft.

22. Savage violence is, the rendering property useless to the owner or to himself.

23. Theft is, every thing that is taken in absence and denied.

24. Surreption is, every thing that is taken in absence and not denied.

25. Violence is, every thing that is taken in the presence of a person and against his will.

26. Inadvertence is, every thing that is taken instead of another thing: there is nothing required for ²⁷inadvertence, but to indemnify the person for his property.

[PREFACE.]

HOWEL the good, son of Cadell, king of Cymru, enacted, by the grace of God and fasting and prayer, when Cymru was in his possession in its bounds; to wit, 'three score and four' cantrevs in South Wales, eighteen cantrevs of Gwynedd, three score trevs beyond the 'Cyrchell, and three score trevs of 'Buellt. And within that limit the word of no one went before 'their word, and 'their word was binding upon all.

As bad customs and bad laws existed before his time, he summoned six men from every cymwd in Cymru, and assembled them at the White House upon the Tav, together with seven score croziers, between bishops, and archbishops, and abbots, and good teachers, to form wholesome laws, and to abrogate the bad ones before his time, and to give them stability in his own name.

And, out of that number, twelve of the wisest laics and the best scholar were selected to make those laws. And when they had finished those laws they imprecated the malediction of God, and of that assembly, and of Cymru in general, upon whosoever should break those laws.

² There appears to be an error in this reading, as there never were so many cantrevs in all Wales; if 'cymwds' be substituted, the account would be near the truth. The reading of Z., as probably correct, would have been inserted in the text, if so modern a transcript could be preferred before five ancient MSS.

[THE LAWS OF THE COURT.

I. OF THE OFFICERS OF THE COURT.]

I. And they began with the laws of the court, as they are the most important, since they pertain to the king and queen, and the twenty-four officers who accompany them: namely,

1. Chief of the household.
2. Priest of the household.
3. Steward.
4. Judge of the court.
5. Falconer.
6. Chief huntsman.
7. Chief groom.
8. Page of the chamber.
9. Steward to the queen.
10. Priest to the queen.
11. Bard of the household.
12. Silentiary.
13. Door-ward of the hall.
14. Door-ward of the chamber.
15. Groom of the rein.
16. Chambermaid.
17. Candle-bearer.
18. Butler.
19. Mead brewer.
20. Sewer of the court.
21. Cook.
22. Footholder.
23. Mediciner.
24. Groom of the rein to the queen.
2. All the officers are to have woollen clothing from the king, and linen clothing from the queen, three times in the year; at Christmas, Easter, and Whitsuntide.
3. The queen has a ³share of all the revenue of the king from his landed property.
4. The officers of the queen have a third of all the revenue of the officers of the king.

II. [OF THE KING.]

1. Three persons who do saraad to the king: the person who shall violate his protection; the person who shall kill one of his men in his presence, ²and in the presence of the assemblage, when there shall be a meeting between him and another chieftain; and the person who shall obstruct his wife.

2. A hundred kine are to be paid as saraad to the king for every cantref in his dominion; and a silver rod, with three knobs at top and three knobs at bottom, which shall reach from the ground to the king's face, when he shall sit in his chair, and as thick as his ring finger; and a golden cup, which shall hold the king's full draught, as thick as the nail of a ploughman who shall have ploughed for seven years; and a golden cover as broad ²⁴as the king's face, and as thick' as the edge of the cup.

3. The privilege of the lord of Dinevwr is, as many ³⁰white cows as shall reach completely with the head of one to the tail of the other, with a bull between every score kine, from Argoel to the palace of Dinevwr.

4. For the galanas of the king three times as much is paid as for his saraad, thrice augmented.

III. [OF THE QUEEN.]

1. In three ways saraad is done to the queen: when her protection shall be violated; or when she shall be struck in anger; or when a thing shall be forcibly taken out of her hand: for these a third of the worth of the king's saraad is paid to the queen, the gold and silver excepted.

IV. [OF THE KING'S RETINUE.]

1. The king is to have thirty-six persons on horseback in his retinue: the twenty-four officers, and the twelve gwestais; likewise his household, his gwrðas, his youths, his minstrels, and his suitors.

V. [OF THE EDLING.]

1. The edling is the most honourable person after the king and the queen.

2. He is to be a brother, or a son, ³or a nephew the son of a brother, to the king.

3. The protection of the edling is, to conduct the person who commits the offence to a place of safety.

4. The saraad and the galanas of the edling and the king are alike, excepting the royal gold and silver, and the cattle which are to reach from Argoel to the palace of Dinevwr.

5. The place of the edling in the hall is opposite to the king, on the other side of the fire.

6. Between the heir-apparent and the pillar, next to him, the judge of the court sits; and the priest of the household on the other side of him; next to him the chief of song; and after that there is no fixed place for any one in the hall.

7. All the royal issue, the freemen, and the collectors of the geld, are to be in the lodging of the edling.

8. The king is to defray the whole expenditure of the edling in an honourable manner.

9. The lodging of the edling, and the youths with him, is in the hall.

10. The woodman is to kindle the fire for him, and to shut the doors when the edling is gone to rest.

11. The edling is to have a sufficiency ⁴¹at his repast, without measure.

12. On the three principal festivals a privileged boneddig sits on the right hand side of the king; thence every one as he may will.

VI. [OF THE PROTECTIONS.]

1. A right of granting ⁶⁰royal protection pertains to every officer, and to others, also, who shall resort ⁶¹to the court.

2. The protection of the queen is, to conduct beyond the bounds of the country, without pursuit and without obstruction.

3. The protection of the chief of the household is, to conduct the person beyond the bound of the cymwd.

5. The chief of the household is to be a son, or a nephew, "the son of" a brother, to the king.

6. A hornful of mead comes to him, from the queen, at every banquet.

7. If the king, in displeasure, suffer any one of the household to remain below the fire-place, let the chief of the household invite such a person to his own company.

8. The chief of the household sits at the end of the hall, with all the household around him.

9. Let him place which elder he may will on his right hand, and another on his left.

10. He has a horse, always in attendance, from the king.

11. His horse has two rations of provender.

X. THE PRIVILEGE OF THE PRIEST OF THE HOUSEHOLD.

1. Whoever shall do saraad to, or shall murder the priest of the household, let him first submit to the law of the synod: and, for his saraad, twelve kine are to be paid him: he is to have a third, and the two remaining parts go to the king.

2. To the priest of the household belongs the garment in which the king shall do penance, during Lent, against Easter.

3. To him belongs the offering of the king, and of the household, and the offering of those who shall receive an offering from the king at the three principal festivals: he, however, always receives the king's offering.

4. He has a dish of meat, as provision from the palace, and a hornful of mead.

5. And he has a horse, always in attendance, from the king.

6. And he has a third of all the king's tithes.

7. And the priest of the household is one of the three indispensable persons to the king.

nounced by the judge, let the judge place the two pledges in the king's hands; and if the judge of the court be foiled, his word shall never be judicial; and let him pay the worth of his tongue to the king; and, thenceforward, never again officiate. The judge of the court has forty days to reconsider, if he demand it, before mutually pledging. If the other, however, be foiled, let him pay his saraad to the judge of the court, and the worth of his tongue to the king.

10. The saraad of the judge of the court is nine kine, and nine score of silver.

11. His galanas is paid with nine score and nine kine, with three augmentations.

12. In this manner the augmentations are to be made: the first is, three score kine; the second is, four score kine; the third is, a hundred and five kine and a third of two kine: and thus the galanas of every Cymro is augmented, according to his privilege.

13. The judge is to have four legal pence from every cause of the value of four legal pence.

14. The third indispensable person about the king is the judge of the court.

15. Twenty-four pence 'he has' when 'the boundary of land shall be settled.

16. If a person enter law without the leave of the judge of the court, let him pay three kine camlwrw to the king; and, if the king be present, let him pay double.

17. No one is to act as a judge, if he shall not know the three columns of law, and the worth of 'wild and tame.'

18. The judge of the court has linen from the queen at all times.

19. The horse of the judge of the court is to be at the same manger as the king's horse.

20. His horse has two rations of the provender.

21. The groom of the rein shall bring his horse 'and his arms' in proper order to the judge of the court whenever he shall will it.

22. He has his land free.
 23. And he has a horse, in attendance, from the king.
 24. When his office shall be pledged to him he receives trinkets; to wit, a throw-board from the king, and a gold ring from the queen: and he is not to part with these trinkets, either by sale, or by gift.
 25. When a bard shall take a chair, the judge of the court takes the bugle horn, and the gold ring, and the cushion that is placed under him in his chair.
 26. The judge of the court has twenty-four pence from every suit for saraad, and every suit for theft; and that from the person who shall escape from the charge.
 27. He has the tongue from the head that comes as a present to the king, and all the tongues in the palace; for he decides upon all the tongues: and the king is to fill the place of the tongue with the thigh muscle of the animal for the smith of the court.
 28. The daughter of the judge of the court and the daughter of the steward have the same privilege.
 29. He is free from dirwy and ebediw: for the functions of a judge surpass all temporal things.
 30. He is the third person who supports 'the privilege of the court' in the king's absence.

XIV. THE PRIVILEGE OF THE CHIEF GROOM.

1. The due of the chief groom is to have the hides of cattle; that is, the hide of an ox in winter, and the hide of a cow in summer, 'from the steward,' to make halters for the king's horses; and that before sharing the hides between the steward and the servants.
 2. To the chief groom belong the legs of every ox that shall be slaughtered in the kitchen; and salt shall be given to him with them.
 3. He has the share of two men of the 'groom's silver.
 4. To him belong the old saddles and bridles of the king's steed.

10. And his horse has two rations of the provender.

11. The place of the chief groom, and the grooms with him, is by the pillar next to the king.

12. The chief groom, the chief huntsman, and the foot-holder, do not sit by the wall of the hall: each of them knows his place.

13. To him belongs the arrangement of the stabling of the horses, and their provender.

14. The chief groom has the third of the dirwy and camlwrw of the grooms.

15. He furnishes a halter with every horse which the king shall give.

16. To him belong the king's cap, if there be fur on it; and his spurs, if they be gilded, or silvered, or lacquered; when discarded.

XV. THE PRIVILEGE OF THE FALCONER.

1. What day soever the falconer shall take a heron, or a bittern, or a curlew, with his hawk, the king performs three services for him: hold his horse while he shall mount; and hold his horse while he shall dismount; and hold his horse while he shall secure the birds.

2. Three times the king presents him on that night with food with his own hands: for, by his messenger he sends presents to him daily, except on the three principal festivals, and the day that he shall kill a notable bird.

3. He sits on one side of the canghellor at the banquet.

4. The falconer has the skin of a hart from the chief huntsman, in October, to make jesses, and gloves for himself.

5. His horse has the rations of two horses of provender.

6. He only drinks three times, in the hall, lest, through ebriety, his hawks should be neglected: there shall be a vessel, however, to receive his liquor, in the palace.

7. He has a horse, always in attendance, from the king.

8. If the falconer kill his horse in hunting, or it die by chance, he shall have another horse from the king.

9. Every male hawk belongs to him.

10. The nest of a sparrow-hawk, found on the palace demesne, belongs to him.

11. He has a mess of meat, for his provision, from the palace, with three hornfuls of liquor, in his lodging.

12. From the time that the falconer shall put the hawks in their mews, until the time he shall take them out, he gives no answer to any one that shall sue him.

13. He has gwestva once a year from the king's taeogs; and from every taeog-trev he has a crone, or four pence, for food for his hawks.

xvi. THE PRIVILEGE OF THE CHIEF HUNTSMAN.

1. The chief huntsman has the hide of an ox in the winter, from the steward, to make leashes for the king's dogs.

2. The huntsmen hunt for the benefit of the king until the calends of December; whatever they may obtain, from that time, until the 'ninth day of December,' they share not with the king.

3. There are no legal pieces in the king's hart after the calends of December.

4. On the ninth day of December the chief huntsman is to show to the king his dogs, his horns, and his leashes, and his third of the skins.

5. Until the ninth day of December no one, that shall sue him, shall have any answer from the chief huntsman, unless he be an officer of the palace; for, no one of the officers can delay the suit of another, if there be any one to determine it.

6. The chief huntsman has the share of two men of the skins from the huntsmen with the covert-hounds; and he has one man's share from the huntsmen with the greyhounds.

7. After the skins shall be shared between the king and the huntsmen, let the chief huntsman together with the huntsmen, take up their quarters with the king's taeogs; and then let them return to the king at Christmas to receive their right from him.

8. The chief huntsman has a third of the king's share of the skins; for it is with him that the king shares in thirds.

9. The place of the chief huntsman, having the huntsmen with him, in the hall is below the pillar opposite to the king.

10. A hornful of liquor is brought to him, at every banquet, from the king or the chief of the household; and another from the queen; and the third from the steward.

11. He has a tame sparrow-hawk, every Michaelmas, from the falconer.

12. He has provision in his lodging; to wit, a mess, and a hornful of mead or other liquor.

13. To him belong the thirds of the dirwy, and camlwrw, and ebediw, and gobyr of the daughters of all the other huntsmen;
and the two shares to the king.

14. The huntsmen are with the king from Christmas until they shall hunt hinds in the spring.

15. From the time they shall begin to hunt in the spring until the ninth day of May, they shall not answer to any one that may sue them, unless he be an officer of the palace.

16. He has his land free.

17. He has a horse, always in attendance, from the king.

ox from the palace, which are in length only to the ancle.

6. On the ninth day ⁷before the calends of December, he has, from the king, a coat, a shirt, a cap, and three ells, from his elbow to the end of his middle finger, of linen, to make him trousers.

7. There is to be no tenlliv in his trousers.

8. His clothes are to reach in length only to below his knee to the tie of his trousers.

9. On the calends of March he has a coat, a shirt, trousers, and a mantle; and a bonnet on the three principal festivals, Easter, Christmas, and Whitsuntide.

10. To him pertains to share between the king, the maer, and the canghellor.

11. From a fugitive tacog, and a marw-dy, when the stock shall be shared, every odd sheaf belongs to him.

12. When a geldable fugitive shall leave his corn unrcaped, and when similar corn chances at a marw-dy, the apparitor has the headlands.

13. He has the bacon in cut from the marw-dy, the butter in cut, and the nether stone of the quern, all the green flax and the flax seed, the layer next to the ground of the corn-rick, the hatchets, the reapinghooks, the fowls, the geese, and the cats.

14. He has a loaf, with its enllyn, in every house to which he goes upon the king's business.

15. Three cubits only are to be in the length of his bill lest he be discovered.

16. To him belongs the bull that shall come among the spoil.

17. When the apparitor shall die, his property is at the king's mercy.

18. The summons of the apparitor, with witnesses, and striking the post three times, cannot be denied but by objecting. When the summons of the apparitor shall be denied, however, the oath of the person summoned, with that of two men equal in privilege to himself, deny it.

11. Whoever shall pay galanas, if the whole of his kindred be in the same country with him, full payment is required of him by the end of a fortnight : if the kindred be scattered in several other countries, a delay of a fortnight is right, in respect to each country.

12. The dire event of galanas is, when a person shall kill another man, and appoints a day for compensating that crime, and he also be killed by a man of another kindred, to whom nothing is due, before that crime is compensated : such a deed is called a dire event of galanas, because of its being so fatal to lose him, and to pay the galanas previously committed by him.

13. The worth of a thief, when liable to be sold, is seven pounds.

14. The worth of a gorvodog is the same as that of the one for whom he is bound : and so also in respect to a person pledged for another.

15. The time for a gorvodog to accomplish his obligation is a year and a day.

16. One person to whom a spear penny is paid, and who pays to no one ; a woman who shall commit murder.

IX. THE LAW AS TO A COLT, AND ITS WORTH.

1. From the time a colt is foaled until August it is four legal pence in value :

2. Thence until the calends of December it is twelve pence in value :

3. Until the calends of February it is eighteen pence in value :

4. Until the calends of May it is twenty-four pence in value :

5. Until the calends of August it is thirty pence in value :

6. Until the calends of December it is thirty-six pence in value :

7. Until the calends of February it is forty-two pence in value :

8. And until the calends of May it is forty-eight pence in value.

9. It is then two years old, and then it is three score pence in value until August :

10. Then an increase of twelve legal pence, and twelve, likewise, every season

XXIV. THE LAW OF A STAG.

1. Whoever shall kill a king's hart of grease, let him pay three kine camlwrw to the lord for it.

2. There are twelve lawful pieces in it: to wit, the tongue, the three pieces of the neck, the lights, the heart, the two loins, the chine, the haunch, the stomach, the nombles, the liver.

3. Three kine camlwrw are paid for each of those pieces.

4. Twelve kine are paid for the whole hart of grease; when reckoned together.

5. There are no lawful pieces in the king's hart, except from the feast of St. Curig to the calends of winter; and neither is it a king's hart of grease, but whilst it shall contain the lawful pieces from the feast of St. Curig to the calends of winter.

If the stag be killed at mid-day, let him keep the stag whole for that night; and, unless the huntsmen then come, let the breyr make use of that in the manner of the former one.

2. If the king's hart be killed during the night in the trev of a breyr, let the breyr spread his mantle over it, and keep it whole until the morning; and, if the huntsmen do not then come, let it be treated in the manner of the former one.

3. If a freeman be hunting with covert-hounds, let him wait in the morning until the king's huntsmen loose their dogs three times; and then let him loose.

4. Whoever shall kill a hart upon another person's land, let him give a quarter to the owner of the land upon which it shall be killed, unless it be the king's dogs; for there is no quarter in the king's hart.

5. If a person, from the road, see a beast in the king's forest, let him discharge a missile at it, if he will; and, if he hit it, let him pursue whilst he shall see it; and, if it slip from his sight, let him leave it.

XXVI. THE LAW OF A HAWK'S NEST.

1. One pound is the worth of a hawk's nest.

2. Six score pence is the worth of a hawk before mewing, and whilst it shall remain in the mew:

3. If it be white after mewing, it is one pound in value.

4. Twenty-four pence is the worth of a male hawk.

5. Six score pence is the worth of a buzzard's nest:

6. If it be white after mewing, it is six score pence in value.

7. Three score pence is the worth of a buzzard before mewing, and whilst it shall remain in the mew.

10. If it be white after mewing, it is twenty-four pence in value.

XXVII. THE LAW OF BEES.

1. The origin of bees is from paradise, and on account of the sin of man they came from thence, and God conferred his blessing upon them; and, therefore, the mass cannot be sung without the wax.

2. A stock of bees is twenty-four pence in value.

3. The first swarm is sixteen pence in value.

4. The second swarm is ¹²twelve pence in value.

5. The third swarm is eight pence in value.

6. A stock of bees, after the first swarm has gone out of it, is twenty pence in value.

7. After the second swarm has gone out of it, it is sixteen pence in value.

8. After the third swarm has gone out of it, it is twelve pence in value.

9. A wing swarm is four pence in value. A wing swarm is a swarm that has not had three days of fair weather before August: a day to seek a place; the second to move; and the third to rest.

10. The ninth day before August, twenty-four pence is the value of every swarm; because it then assumes the privilege of a stock.

11. A wing swarm does not assume the privilege of a stock until the calends of May; then, however, twenty-four pence is its worth, like the rest.

12. Whoever shall find a swarm upon a bough in another person's land, has a penny from the owner of the land, if he will have the swarm.

13. Whoever shall find a wild swarm upon another person's land, has a legal penny, or the wax, at the option of the owner of the land.

XXVIII. THE LAW OF CORN, AND IMPOUNDING.

1. From the time corn is put into the ground, until it comes into its sheaf, money payment is to be made for it; and thence a sound sheaf instead of the one damaged.

2. For every fettered or clogged horse, a penny the day, and two the night.

3. If the horse be entirely freed of restraint, ¹⁴a halfpenny the day, and a penny the night.

4. If the taker unfetter it, when caught upon the corn, let him pay three kine camlwrw to the king; let him, however, put the two clogs upon the same foot of the horse, and thus he forfeits nothing.

5. For every fold ox, a halfpenny the day, and ²⁶two the night.

6. Of the legal herd of swine, let him catch the sow he may choose, excepting the three special ones which, if caught in their trespass, by law, are free; and take a penny for every sow of the others; and then, however, let him offer it to the owner, in the presence of witnesses; and, if he do not redeem it, let the taker make use of the sow.

7. The lawful herd of the swine is twelve animals and a boar.

8. A pig, when it shall first turn up the dung with its snout, is under the same law with its mother.

9. Of the lawful herd of the swine, at what time soever they be found damaging hay land, four legal pence are paid for them.

10. Any one who shall find swine doing damage in his woods, let him kill one of them, every time he shall find them, unto the last; excepting the three special animals: those three are, the principal of the swine; the herd boar; and the sow for [the gwestva.]

11. Of the lawful flock of the sheep a sheep is taken; and a farthing for every ⁴⁸five sheep.

12. The amount of the lawful flock of the sheep is thirty sheep and a ram.

kill the other; the owner of the animal is bound to pay for the animal killed; and the impounder is free.

23. If the animals of a hamlet kill a beast, and it be not known whose it was that killed it; let the owner come to the people, and let them swear an oath of ignorance; and then let them pay for the beast, by the average of the oxen; and, if it be a cush ox, let there be the share of two oxen on it: and that law is called, complete payment after complete swearing. ⁸If one ox be acknowledged to have killed the other, let the owner pay without delay.

24. If there be a hamlet herdsman, his testimony is to be credited, as to which beast shall kill the other: for the ninth person whose testimony is to be credited, is the hamlet herdsman concerning his charge.

25. Whoever shall break the foot of an animal belonging to another person, or its thigh, or inflict a wound that shall cause ailment, and the animal be clean, so that its flesh may be eaten; he is to take it himself, and apply remedies, until it shall be well: and, if it die, let him pay the worth of it.

26. Whoever shall hire or engage an animal, either to carry a load, or to plough; unless it be used unlawfully, although it may lose its life, it is not to be paid for.

27. If an animal bite a person, the bitten person has the animal that has bitten him; or let the owner of the animal pay the saraad of the person, and the worth of his blood.

28. Whoever shall say that animals have damaged his corn, the owner of the animals is to exculpate them, upon his oath, as to the amount of the damage they have done; and, for what he will not swear to, he is to pay the damage.

29. Whoever shall have right for corn damaged by animals, is to have neither payment for, nor detain animals on, that worthless straw thenceout.

XXIX. GOBYRS OF WOMEN.

1. Seven pounds is the gobyr of the king's daughter, and is paid to the mother; and the husband pays the cowyll; for land is paid to her.

2. Twenty-four pounds is her agweddi.

3. If the daughter of a breyr go away with a man ¹⁶clandestinely, without gift of kindred; when deserted, her agweddi is six bullocks, with horns and ears of equal length.

4. The daughter of a taeog has three bullocks as her agweddi.

5. If a man take a wife, by gift of kindred, and leave her before the end of seven years; let him pay her agweddi to her.

6. If she be a breyr's daughter, her agweddi is three pounds.

7. One pound and a half is her cowyll.

8. Six score pence is her gobyr.

9. If she be a taeog's daughter, her agweddi is one pound and a half.

10. Six score pence for her cowyll.

11. Twenty-four pence for her gobyr.

12. If she be left after the end of seven years, let there be an equal sharing between them; unless the privilege of the husband entitle him to more.

13. Two thirds of the children come to the husband; to wit, the eldest and the youngest; and the third to the mother.

14. If they be separated by death, every thing is to be equally shared between them.

15. The saraad of a married woman is paid her according to the privilege of her husband.

16. When a married man shall be murdered, his saraad is first paid; and then his galanas; for the wife has the third of the saraad, and she has no part of the galanas.

17. The wife of a privileged man can lend her shift, her mantle, her head-cloth, ⁴³and her shoes, without the consent of her husband; and may give her food and drink; and lend the furniture of the house unrestrictedly.

18. The wife of a taeog cannot give any thing, nor lend it, without the consent of her husband, excepting her bonnet, ⁵her sieve, and her riddle; and that only to the distance she can be heard calling, with her foot upon the threshold.

father can bring her back against her will, from her husband; and he is not to pay her amobyr to the lord.

20. If a woman, however, go away clandestinely, no one can bring her back against her will, from her husband.

21. According to where her home may be, her amobyr is paid.

22. Whoever shall commit a rape upon a woman, let him pay her gobyr to the lord; and her dirwy, and her agweddi, and her dilyadawd, and her saraad, he pays to the woman: and, if she be a maid, let him pay her cowyll.

23. If the man deny the violation, and the woman persevere in the charge; let her take the relics in her right hand, and penem ejus in manu sinistra; and let her swear to his having violated her: and so she loses nothing of her right.

24. A woman who shall be violated, if she know not who has violated her, is not to pay amobyr; since the king preserved her not from violation, he loses her amobyr: and, if the woman be doubted in that respect, let her give her oath, that she knows not who has violated her; and that she was violated as aforesaid.

25. Whoever shall deny a rape, let him give the oaths of fifty men, without bond, without alltud.

26. From three causes a woman loses not her agweddi, although she may leave her husband: to wit, on account of leprosy; bad breath; and default of connexion.

27. Three things of which a woman is not to be deprived, although she be abandoned for her crime: her cowyll; her argyvreu; and wyneb-werth, when her husband shall be connected with another woman.

28. If a woman walk about alone, and a man come, and violate her; if the man deny it, let him give the oaths of fifty men, three of them abjuring chivalry, and linen, and woman. If he will not deny it, let him pay to the woman her gwaddol, and her dilyadawd, and a dirwy; and a silver rod to the king in the manner he is entitled: and, if the man cannot pay, his testicles shall be taken. If there be two women, let one testicle be given to one, and the other to the other, if he be connected with the two.

29. If a maiden do not exercise her will as to the cowyll, before the husband rise up in the morning, it is to be between them.

30. Three times a wife has her wynebwerth from her husband, when he shall be connected with another woman; and, if she endure 'beyond that,' she has nothing.

31. If a mature maid be given to a man, and the man say she was not a maid; let the maid swear, with four persons nearest to herself in worth, that she was not a woman: the persons are to be, herself, her father, her mother, her brother, and her sister.

32. Three oaths a woman gives to a husband, when scandalized: first, the oaths of seven women; and, on the second scandal, the oaths of fourteen women; and, on the third scandal, the oaths of fifty women: and, if he endure beyond that, he has nothing.

33. Let no one give a woman to a man, without taking surety for her gobyr to the lord.

34. If a man take a woman ' clandestinely to any house, let the man of the house take surety for her gobyr to the lord; and, if he do not take it, let him pay himself.

35. The gobyr of a female alltud is twenty-four pence.

36. If a Welsh female be given to an alltud, her children have a share of the 'father's trev, excepting the principal homestead; that, however, they are not to have until the third descent.

37. From such connexion originate the cattle without surety; since there is no father's kindred for such, the whole of the galanas falls upon the mother's kindred.

38. If a husband and wife separate before the end of the seventh year, the furniture is thus shared between them. To the husband belong the bed-clothes between him and the floor: and to the wife belongs the coverlid. The corn belongs to the husband: and the made flour belongs to the wife. the irons belong to the husband, those excepted. To the wife belong the ox car, the yokes, and all the milk vessels but one pail, and all the dishes but one dish, which belong to the husband. All the butter belongs to the wife but one vessel, which belongs to the husband: and, if there be lumps of butter, the husband has one: to the wife belong all the unhung meat, salted and unsalted, and all the cheese in brine and unsalted. To the husband belong all the hung meat and cheese.

39. It belongs to the wife to stop in her house, waiting her share of the property, until the end of the ninth day.

40. A wife who shall say that she is pregnant when her husband shall die, is to remain in her house until it shall be known whether she be so; and, if she be not pregnant, let her pay three kine camlwrw to the king; and leave the house and the land to the heir.

41. If a man take a woman clandestinely, and keep her with him until the end of the seventh day without doing her right; he is not to do her right until the end of a year and a day; then, however, she is to have full right.

42. A woman of full age who goes with a man clandestinely, and taken by him to bush, or brake, or house, and, after connexion, deserted; upon complaint made by her to her kindred, and to the courts, is to receive, for her chastity, a bull of three winters, having its tail shaven and greased and then thrust through the door-clate; and then let the woman go into the house, the bull being outside, and let her plant her foot on the threshold, and let her take his tail in her hand, and let a man come on each side of the bull, with goads to propel the bull; and, if she can hold the bull, let her take it for her wyneb-werth and her chastity; and, if not, let her take what grease may adhere to her hands.

43. If a woman abandon herself in bush and brake to a man, and be deserted by the man who shall form connexion with another woman, and she come to complain to her kindred, and to the courts; if the

XXX. THESE ARE PLEAS OF LAND AND SOIL, AND DADENHUDDS CONCERNING LAND AND SOIL.

1. There are three kinds of dadenhudds of land: dadenhudd of car; dadenhudd of burden; and dadenhudd of aration.

2. If dadenhudd of burden be adjudged to a person: he has three days and three nights of rest, without suit; and on the third day it is imperative to answer the person who shall sue him; and on the ninth day judgment.

3. If dadenhudd of car be adjudged to him: he has five days and five nights of rest, without suit; and on the ⁶fifth day he gives an answer to him who shall sue him;
and on the ⁹ninth day judgment.

4. If dadenhudd of tith and aration be adjudged to him: he has rest, without suit, until he may turn his back upon the stack in the harvest; and then on the ninth day of December he is to answer to him who shall sue him; and on the ⁹ninth day judgment.

5. No one is entitled to dadenhudd, but of the land that shall have been in the hand of his father in his life-time, and at his death.

6. Whoever shall have dadenhudd adjudged to him; by law, no one can oust him from the dadenhudd but the heir of a proprietor; for the second dadenhudd cannot oppose the first dadenhudd.

7. If there be a mutual claiming among inheritors, as to dadenhudd; no one can oppose the other in his dadenhudd.

8. A dadenhudd is, the tilling by a person of land tilled by his father before him.

9. In the fourth degree a person becomes a proprietor: his father, his grandfather, his great grandfather, and himself the fourth.

10. After he becomes a proprietor, his title does not become extinguished until the ninth, if they be without their right

11. If a tribe-stock be adjudged to lose land, and some of its members be in a border-country, and they be not awaited for law, they are entitled to law when they shall return: if they do not demand law, when they do return, to the end of a year and a day, the law is shut against them thence onward.

12. Whoever shall suffer the transfer of his patrimony, in his presence, to another, without let, without forbiddance; he shall not afterwards have it whilst he shall live.

13. Whoever shall hold land, during three lives, in the same country with persons possessed of title, during the lives of father, grandfather, and great grandfather, without claim, without surclaim, without burning, without breaking of plough; that land shall not be answered for; since the law has shut between them.

14. Whoever shall commence a suit for land, the defendant being ready to answer, and then be silent, and neglect his claim unto the end of a year and a day; although he should begin to proceed in the claim after that, he shall have nothing: for it is a claim beyond a year.

15. Whoever shall claim land on the ninth day of December, shall have judgment respecting it before the ninth day of May: and, if he do not then have judgment, let him claim on the ninth day of the succeeding May, if he will to obtain it; and then equity is open for him, when the king shall will.

16. No one is to institute a claim for land but on one of those two ninth days.

17. Whoever shall claim land on the ninth of December, or on the ninth day of May; on the third day has an answer; and on the ninth day has judgment.

18. If on the ninth day of May he commence proceedings, and delay obtaining judgment, from day to day, until August; he shall not have judgment until the ninth day of December; because the harvest is a close season: if on the ninth day of December he commence proceedings, and delay obtaining judgment, from day to day, through the winter; the spring is a close season, like the harvest: because sowing and harrowing are to suffer no interruption in spring, nor the corn carriage in harvest.

19. If a person 'three times' neglect a summons, on the part of the king, respecting land, unless prevented by great necessity; the land is given to him who shall claim it.

20. If he 'come at' the second summons, or 'at the third summons; let him answer, if it be right for him so to do, as to the land; and let him pay three kine canlwrw to the king for contemning the summons.

21. Lawful excuses for neglecting a summons: flood-water, from sea to mountain, without a ford, without a bridge thereon; imprisonment; and bed-ridden disease.

22. Whoever shall pay an investiture fee for land is not, by right, to pay ebediw.

23. Whoever shall claim land by kin and descent, should his claim be listened to, it is necessary for the elders of the country to swear to his kin.

24. Whoever shall seek to obtain possession of land by kin and descent, if he recur to the distaff more than three times, in tracing his kin, his claim becomes null.

25. Whoever shall claim church land, is not to wait for a ninth day; for justice is to be open for him when he shall ask.

26. If a person seek for a share of land from a kindred, after a long state of exile; let him give them six score pence as guardian-fee, if they concede to him a share.

27. The land that shall be granted by the king to a person, by right, is not to be retaken by him who shall reign after him.

28. Three times is land to be shared between kin: primarily among brothers; afterwards among cousins; and the third time among second cousins: thence onward there is no appropriate sharing of land.

XXXI. SHARING PATRIMONY.

1. When brothers shall share their patrimony among them, the youngest brother is to possess the principal homestead, with the nearest eight erws; with all his father's stock, the boiler, the fuel hatchet, and the coulter; since a father cannot give them, nor devise them, but to the youngest son; and, although they be pledged, they never lapse: then let every brother take a homestead, with eight crws: it belongs to the youngest son to share the land; and from eldest to eldest they choose.

2. Every joint land is to be maintained with 'oath and with goods;' and he who does not so maintain it, let him lose his share, after the sharing shall have taken place, however. No one is to pay for the land of another; each, however, is to maintain it one for another, upon his oath, of the brothers, the cousins, and the second cousins; and the land, which any one of them shall lose, for lack of oath, is to be made good by the others: beyond second cousins no one is to preserve the share of another, either with his goods, or with his oath.

3. Although there may be only one inheritor of joint land with unextinguished title, he is to have the whole of the land: after it shall be shared, however, the king is to be heir to him who is extinguished.

4. There are three sons, three brothers, by the same mother, the same father, two of whom have no share of their father's property from their own brothers: one of them is a son of bush and brake, whose father afterwards takes the woman, by gift of kindred, and begets a son by that same woman; such son is not to share the land with the son begotten before him in bush and brake; the second is, if there be a scholar, and he take a woman, by gift of kindred, and beget a son by such woman, and then takes priest orders, and begets another son by the same woman; the son begotten before him is not to share land with him; because he was begotten contrary to decree; the third is a mute, since land is not to be given to a mute.

5. A woman who shall give herself up in bush and brake, without the consent of kindred; her children have no share of land, unless by favour: for no son begotten in bush and brake is entitled to a share of land.

6. No one, on the part of a mother, has a principal homestead, if there be one entitled to it on the part of a father: it is right, however, on the part of a mother to have a share of land.

the trev, to know the sharing between kindred and relatives ; and when there shall be contention between two trevs, the maers, ringylls, and canghellors, to ascertain the keeping of boundaries ; ¹⁶for it belongs to the king to meer.'

8. It belongs to the court to meer land ; and after the court, the church ; and after the church, privilege ; and after privilege, prior conservancy on waste ; a house, a kiln,
and a barn, constitute prior conservancy.

9. Three cases whercin the law shares :
one of them is, if contention arise between two trevs, as to land and boundary, they being of equal privilege, it belongs to the king's gwrda to determine it, if they be able ; if they doubt the proprietors of the land, every one must swear to his boundary ; and afterwards, let them share equally the object of contention between the two trevs.

10. Although a trev shall meer to another, it is not to take a randir from it.

11. Half \square pound comes to the king when \square meer shall be fixed between two trevs ; and twenty-four pence comes to the ^{*}judge.

12. When the law shall award land to a person, half a pound comes to the king from every randir when he shall give investiture.

13. The second is, between \square husband and wife, when one party shall die.

14. The third is, when an animal shall be taken from a place where it cannot be had by law ; to wit, from an illegal state to a legal state.

XXXIII. OF MEER BREACH.

1. Whoever shall breach a meer between two trevs ; or shall plough a highway ;
let him pay six score pence to the king ; and let him restore the meer to its former state.

2. Whoever shall breach a meer upon the land of another person ; let him pay three kine camlwrw to the king ; and let him restore the meer to its former state.

XXXV. [OF DUES.]

1. Neither maer, nor canghellor, 'has share, or' quarters, from a free man.

2. Once in the year it is requisite for every body to go into a border country, in the army, along with the king, ²⁵if he will it; and then the queen is entitled to a lady-progress.

3. Always, however, when the king shall will it, he is to be accompanied in his army, within his own country.

4. The huntsmen, the falconers, and the grooms, once in the year, have a progress among the king's taeogs: each party, however, separately.

5. A taeog-trev is not to begin ploughing until each taeog shall have his co-tillage appointed.

6. The taeogs are to make nine buildings for the king: a hall, chamber, kitchen, chapel, barn, kiln-house, necessary, stable, and dog-kennel.

7. The taeogs are to furnish sumpter-horses to the army for the king: and from every taeog-trev he has a man, and horse, and hatchet, at the cost of the king, however, to make encampments for him.

XXXVI. [OF DEFUNCT TESTIMONY.]

1. There are three defunct testimonies, which can stand in judgment ⁶concerning land: one is, contention ⁶and fighting having taken place between two ⁶parties, for land ⁷and meers, and the contention afterwards duly terminated in the presence of every body; after those shall have all died, their sons, or their grandsons, or some of the kindred, can bear testimony as to ⁶what they have heard from their ancestors; and those are called evidences as to land: the second is, privileged boneddigs on every part to confirm a person in his title, and to decide and show what is right; and those are called land borderers: the third is, when there shall be seen the fire back-stone, or the mounting-stone, of the father, or of the grandfather, or of the great grandfather, or of a man of the kindred of the same title with himself; and the tofts of the houses and barns, and the furrows of the land ploughed, ²²and the erws; each of those bear testimony to a person's title.

XXXVII. SWEARING AS TO LAND.

1. There is to be no swearing to land on a Sunday, or on a Monday; Sunday is a day for praying; Monday is a day for labouring, to procure relics and essentials for swearing to land.

2. Whoever shall kill his brother, because that he will not share patrimony with him; with such a homicide a kindred is not to pay galanas; but he is to pay the galanas to the relatives: and let him forfeit for ever the patrimony.

XXXVIII. HERE ARE THE CASES WHEREIN GUARDIANS ARE REQUIRED.

- 1. In the first place, to guard land and soil to a person.
- 2. The second is, to guard before loss.
- 3. The third is, to guard birth and rearing.
- 4. The fourth is, to guard a guest.
- 5. The fifth is, to guard privilege.
- 6. The sixth is, to guard an alltud to a person.

7. No one is to utter a cry of distress, but one refused law in the court of his lord, or in the pleadings, for his patrimony; or the ninth person, lest his title should be extinguished.

8. A summons executed by an apparitor standing before witnesses, and striking the post three times, or the spot upon the land where he executes the summons; such a summons cannot be denied.

9. When it shall be denied, however, the oath of the person who shall be summoned, with two men of equal privilege to himself, and against the apparitor himself, is to deny the summons.

XXXIX. [TRIADS.]

1. There are three women against whose issue there are to be no pleas respecting the inheritance of their mother: a woman who shall be given in pledge for land, and who bears a son whilst she remains as a pledge; and a woman who shall be given, with consent of kindred, to an alltud; and a woman whose son shall avenge a man of his mother's kindred, and lose his patrimony on account of that crime; with whom there ought to be no disputing concerning the inheritance of his mother.

2. There are three stays of boundary: privilege; proprietorship; and prior conservancy on waste: no person who has inferior rights to those is to meer to them.

3. There are three whose car-removals are without return: a doubted son after he shall have once been rejected by a kindred; a man after he shall have once been ejected from landed property; such ought not to obtain land afterwards; and a woman after she shall have once been expelled from her bed lawfully; she is not ever to come back to that bed again, according to law.

4. There are three calamitous losses of a kindred: one is, a doubted son, without being affiliated, and without being denied by a kindred, who should kill a man of another kindred, owing him nothing; the whole of that galanas must be paid; and then he is to be denied, lest he should commit a second crime: the second is, payment of the whole of a galanas, excepting a penny halfpenny; should there be a failure of that sum, and a person of the kindred be killed, on account of that failure, there is to be no claim for him: the third is, when an innocent one is scandalized concerning a murder, and he be proceeded against, and does not deny it by a period lawfully fixed; if a person of the kindred be killed, no reparation is to be made for it.

5. There are three periods lawfully fixed to avenge murder: between two kindreds, who are not natives of the same country, the claim is to be preferred on the first day of the ensuing week after the homicide; and, at the end of a fortnight, unless an answer come, the law exonerates the avenging: the second is, if the two kindreds be in the same cantrev, the claim is to be preferred on the third day after the homicide; and, unless an answer come by the end of the ninth day, the law exonerates the avenging: the third is, if the two kindreds be in the same cymwd, the claim is to be preferred on the third day after the homicide; and, unless an answer come by the end of the the sixth day, the law exonerates the avenging.

6. The three nets of the king are: his household, and there is no reparation on account of that net, but the mercy of the king; the second net is his stud, for every horse caught among his stud, the king has four legal pence; the third is, the cattle of his maer-house, for every beast found among them, the king has four legal pence.

7. The three nets of a breyr are: his stud; his cattle; and his swine: because, if an animal be found among them, the breyr has four legal pence for every animal.

8. The three nets of a taeog are: his cattle; his swine; and his homestead; from the calends of May until the end of September he has four curt pence for every animal he shall find therein.

9. The three dirwys of the king are: a dirwy for acknowledged fighting; the dirwy for violence; a gold rod, as described in the beginning; and a dirwy on account of 'a cry, or blood.'

of woman: one is, to ¹abduce a woman against her will; the second is, where a man takes another woman into the house to his wife, against her will, and turns her out; the third is, the despoiling of his wife, being more pleased to spoil her than to be connected with her.

11. There are three excitements to revenge: one is, seeing the bier ¹²of their relative going to the church; the second is, the screaming of female relations; the third is, seeing the grave ¹³fresh in the church-yard' without having reparation.

12. There are three birds, the worth of which the king is to have, in what place soever they may be killed: a ¹⁴hawk; a buzzard; and a raven: the owner of the land whereon they may be killed is entitled to ¹⁵thirty pence from the person who shall kill any one of them.

13. There are three thrusts not to be redressed: one of them, a person demanding right from his enemy, in three courts, on account of his relative, and not obtaining right; and afterwards meeting with his enemy, and thrusting him with a spear, so that he die; there is to be no reparation to him for that thrust: the second is, jealousy caused to a married woman, by another woman, concerning her husband; and the two women meeting together, and the married woman making a thrust at the other woman with her hands, so that she die; there is to be no reparation to her: the third is, giving a maiden to a man, with surety as to her virginity; and he making a thrust, and once having connexion with her, and finding her a woman; he then is to call the marriage guests to him, candles are to be lighted, and her shift cut behind her to the height of her buttocks, and before her to the height of her pubes; which is the law for a deceitful maid; and to send her off with that thrust, without any reparation to her.

galanas to relations is paid; the third is, a father; for a share comes to him of the galanas of his son, to wit, one penny; since his son is no relative to him: and no one of those three are to be killed for galanas. A sister pays half a brother's share of galanas, and she receives no share of galanas.

15. There are three persons free to travel the road, and out of the road: a priest, to visit the sick, along with his messenger; the second is, an apparitor, upon his lord's commission; the third is, a mediciner, along with the messenger of the sick.

26. There are three legal needles: the needle of a seamstress to the queen; the needle of the mediciner of the court, for sewing the wounds; and the needle of the chief huntsman, for sewing the torn dogs: for each of them four legal pence are paid.

27. The three disgraceful faults of a man:
the being a faithless friend; feeble in pleadings; and a man to a bad lord.

28. The three signs of inhabitaney of a country: little children; and dogs; and cocks.

29. There are three distresses not to be restored: a distress for theft; and on a surety who will not enforce right; and for galanas.

30. The three sarraads to a dead body are:
when it shall be killed; when despoiled;
and when thrown to the ground.

31. The three reproaches of a dead body are: the asking, Who killed this? To whom belongs this bier? and the asking, To whom does this new grave belong?

32. There are three pieces of flesh of a hundred recurrences: one is, theft, ³³what-ever way a share of it may travel; for there are nine accessaries to it; the king's hart; ³⁴whoever may cut it up; and a carcass

33. There are three free timbers in the forest of the king: the roof-tree of a church; wood for a bier; and shafts which go for the use of the king.

34. There are three places where a person is not to give the oath of an absolver:
one is, on a bridge of a single timber, without a hand-rail; the second is, at the porch of a church yard; for the 'Pater' is to be there chaunted for the souls of the Christians of the world; and at the church door; for the 'Pater' is there to be chaunted before the rood.

36. There are three stays of blood: the breast; the middle girdle; and the trousers girdle.

37. There are three free hunts in every country, since there is no property in them: an otter; a fox; and a roebuck.

38. The three indispensables of a kindred: the representative; the avenger of the kindred; and its avoucher.

39. The three lawful rests of a spear during pleadings: one is, thrusting its butt end in the earth with one hand, so that it scarcely can be drawn out with both hands; the second is, thrusting its point in a bush till the blade be hidden; the third is, the placing it upon a thicket, that shall be of the height of a man: and unless it be on one of those three rests, and a person encounter it so as to cause his death; the third of his galanas falls upon the owner of the spear.

40. By three ways is a son to be affiliated 'to a father: one of them, when a woman of bush and brake shall be pregnant, upon arrival at her full time, let her parish priest visit her, and let her swear before him, in this manner: 'May I be delivered of a snake by this pregnancy, if any father has begotten it on a mother, other than that man;' and naming him; and so she affiliates him lawfully: the second is, the chief of kindred, with the hands of seven of the kindred, affiliate him: the third is, if there be no chief of kindred, the oaths of fifty men of her kindred affiliate the issue to the man: ⁴³and the son himself first swears, for the mother's oath is not legal but in the first case.'

is a warrant; a warrant goes not beyond the third hand, and let that establish custody before loss; and that defends a person from a charge of theft: the third four are, the four persons to whom there is no protection, either in court, or in church, against the king: one of them, a person who shall violate his protection at any one of the three principal festivals in the court; the second is, a person who shall be pledged willingly to the king; the third is, the king's supperer, ⁹a person who ought to provide for him, and leaves him that night without food; the fourth is, his bondman.

46. In three ways a silver rod is paid to the king, and a golden vessel with a golden cover to it: for violating a woman; for breaking the protection of the road towards a beggar without a home; and for saraad to the king.

47. There are three properties secure without surety: property which the king shall give to a man, and which comes to him by law; property which a wife shall have from her husband as wyneb-werth, when the husband shall have connexion with another woman; and property taken in a war between two lords.

48. There are three cases, in the law of Howel, in which proof occurs: one of them, it belongs to a woman to prove a rape against a man; the second is, it belongs to a debtor to prove, over the grave of the surety his being surety, and that his suretiship was not exonerated whilst he lived; the third is, the proving a shepherd dog.

55. Three common to a kindred : a chief of kindred ; a representative ; and the son of a woman given by the consent of kindred to their enemy ; he is to be in common between the two kindreds.

56. There are three animals whose teithi exceed their legal worth : a stallion ; a hamlet bull ; and a herd boar : for the breed is lost, if they be lost.

XL. [VARIOUS.]

1. The law as to gold is, to give it from hand to hand, with witnesses, into the hand of the receiver to keep.

2. The law as to silver is, to count it openly from each hand into the hand of the receiver.

3. The skin of an ox, or cow, or stag, or hind, or otter, is twelve pence in value.

4. The skin of a beaver is half a pound in value.

5. The skin of a marten is twenty-four pence in value.

6. The skin of a fitchet is twelve pence in value.

7. Of every wild animal which shall be killed upon another person's land, the owner shall have the hind quarter next the ground, if the flesh be eatable.

8. The king's supperer shall give a penny to the servants to spare ¹⁷the barn, and his ¹⁸food.

9. The fore sitter of a cantrev, to wit, the foot-holder, pays a vat of ¹⁹bragod to the king every year.

10. A son is not to be chief of kindred after the father, in succession ; for chief of kindredship is during life.

11. Whoever shall fell an oak on the king's highway ; let him pay three kine camlwrw to the king ; and the worth of the oak ; and let him clear the way for the king : and, when the king goes by, let him cover the stool of the tree with cloth of one colour.

12. If a tree fall across a stream, and things get entangled in the tree ; the owner of the land on which the tree grew has the derelict, whatever way the stream may have turned the branches of the tree.

14. The king has of the spoil, the studs, the goats, the furred clothes, the arms, and the prisoners, without sharing with any one: he is not to have a third of the working mares, for they are spoil.

15. When a taeog shall take land from the king, the king has three score pence for each randir from the taeog: and, if there be a church upon the land of the taeog-trev, six score pence come to the king from the one who shall take it.

16. The ebediw of the bondman, to whom the king shall give land, is four score and ten pence; and the third comes to the maer and canghellor.

17. A free man is to answer for his alltud in every claim for which he is not to lose tongue, life, or limbs; for no one is to lose tongue, life, or limbs, by the tongue of another person.

18. The worth of a ready-made garment, in the law of Howel the good, is twenty-four of silver.

19. When the law shall require confiscation from a marw-dy, or other occasion, the household and the maer have the heifers, the steers, the stirks, the sheep, the goats, and all that shall be found in the house, except the horses, oxen, large cattle, gold, silver, and furred clothes: and if there be any thing worth one pound it belongs to the king.

20. A third of the galanas falls upon the owner of the weapon by which a person shall be killed.

21. Property that shall be rescued from war to peace, is to be shared between the person who shall take it and its former owner.

22. Whoever shall pay land for galanas, let him pay geld for it to the lord; for the land is to be free to the person to whom it shall be paid. Three herbs are to grow in that land: trefoil; vetches; and thistles: and the worth of a cow from that land is not more than that of the time that she may depasture.

23. Two persons whose worth the king is not to demand although they shall be killed in his country: the bondman of another person; for a person has the property of his bondman as of his animal; and the person who shall be found walking during the night in the king's chamber, without fire, without candle; although the king's servants kill that person his galanas is not to be demanded.

25. A legal stud, fifty mares.

26. A legal herd of cattle, twenty-four kine.

XLI. HERETOFORE WE HAVE TREATED OF LAW TRIADS, NOW WE TREAT OF THE NINTH DAYS.

1. The first is, the ninth day of December, concerning land; the second is, the ninth day of May succeeding; the third is, the ninth day of May, when the milk teithi of a heifer occur; the fourth is, the ninth day of February, the period of a first-working ox.

2. There is a period to the ninth day for the lord to recollect himself as to an oath, when it shall be asserted that he has previously made an oath.

3. There is a period to the ninth day between the court and the church, before answering; and that after a claim, when there shall be a dispute as to land.

4. There is a period to the ninth day concerning a dead body of one of the same cantrev with him who shall have killed him.

5. There are three ninth days for the chief huntsman.

6. There are three ninth days as to the pregnancy of a woman.

7. The ninth day before August every swarm assumes the privilege of a stock hive.

8. There is a period to the ninth day as to a warrant in the same country, or a witness in the same country.

9. There is a period to the ninth day for removing a building erected on the land of another person without his permission.

10. There is a period to the ninth day for a wife to wait for her share of property in her house on separating from her husband.

11. A period to a twice ninth day there is for land when broken up.

12. Listen, thou judge who givest judgments: let not the worth of a penny weigh more with thee than thy God; judge not wrongly for worth, but judge righteously for the sake of God.

13. Little is the wonder there should be doubting in a temporal court, since they change their intention like the elemental gale: whoever, notwithstanding, shall love security, shall be safe from stumbling in the righteous service of the Lord Jesus Christ, which is to the glory of the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. Amen.

I. HITHERTO WE HAVE TREATED OF THE LAWS OF THE COURT, AND THE LAWS OF THE COUNTRY: HENCE ONWARD OF CASUALTIES.

1. Every injury that a person unwittingly commits, let him wittingly redress.

2. If idiots kill other persons, let galanas be paid on their behalf, as for other persons; because their kindred ought to prevent them doing wrong.

3. What sane person soever shall kill an idiot, let him pay his galanas, like the galanas of a sane person.

4. No compensation is to be made for saraad to an idiot; neither is compensation to be made for saraad received from an idiot.

5. Nothing is binding that is done by a ⁴drunken person, whether he give surety in his ebriety, or whatever ⁵else he may promise.

6. If ⁶a person become rabid, and ⁷bite another person, and the person die from that bite; no compensation is to be made by the kindred of the madman; because his death was occasioned by the nature of that disorder.

account of the net, and the net be broken by the animals; compensation is not to be made on either side; for they are "both equally senseless.'

15. If an ox, or any other untoward animal, get entangled in the net, and break the net, and the animal escape, it is right to make compensation; because it is lawful to 'draw the net.

16. If a person owe a debt to another, and time be granted him to pay that debt;
and the debtor obtain the means of liquidating it before the time fixed, and offer it to the creditor, saying, that he ought not to refuse it, since the delay was only necessary for him to procure the amount: whoever has had time given him, is owner of the time, and may do as he will, either delay until the time fixed, or pay before its expiration.

17. What animal soever shall kill a boneddig, and the kindred seek to impose a galanas for the act upon the owner of the animal; they are not entitled to it, although it be acknowledged; because no one person alone is to pay galanas, and his kindred are not to pay for the act of an animal belonging to their relation: and, therefore, that is the only case in which the murderer is to be given up for his deed.

18. Whoever may owe a debt to another, and offer immoveable property for the debt; there is no obligation to accept immoveable property, either in payment, or as a pledge, unless the debtor have no other property but that in his possession: immoveable property is, such as the person, to whom it is offered, cannot remove in the manner he may will.

19. If a person go to hunt, and begin to do so, and loose his dogs at an animal of whatever kind, and stray dogs come up and kill it; the dogs that first started it are to have it, unless the stray dogs belong to the king: and the extent to which the person who starts the game has a claim to it is, until he turn his face homewards, and relinquish the chase; and although his dogs continue to hunt, if he have quitted the chase and his dogs, he can claim no part; if the stray dogs kill the game, it belongs to their owner.

20. If a traveller perceive an animal from the road, and cast at it, either with a stone or with an arrow, from the road, and wound it; he may pursue until he overtake it: but it is not right for him either to shoot game, or pursue it, unless he can do so from the road.

21. Whoever may will to go a fishing, and start fish and pursue them, and in consequence of his pursuit the fish go into the net of another person; by law, the person who first started them is entitled to the fish.

22. If persons make an agreement for fishing, and one say: 'The first fish that are killed shall be mine:' and the other say: 'The last fish that are killed shall be mine;' and only one be taken; the law says, that where there is not an equality, there must be a sharing.

23. If persons be fishing, and, whilst engaged in it, other persons come, while fish are caught, and demand a share of the fish; they are entitled to a share, unless the fish shall have been put on wythes, or on hooks; if so, they are to have none.

24. There are to be three ⁸²privileged courts: the court of a lord; the court of a bishop; and the court of an abbot: each is to hold his own court independently of the others.

25. If a man subject to one of them do a wrong to a man of the other, no one of them is bound to make satisfaction, except in the court of his own lord.

26. If a man subject to the lord commit an offence in the court of the bishop, let him not depart from it, without making satisfaction; and, in like manner, a man subject to the bishop, in the court of the lord; and, in like manner, a man subject to the abbot, in the other courts.

27. When a bishop dies, the lord is to have his property, except the ¹dress of the ²church, its books, ³its chalices, and its land: because every property without an owner is a waif to the king. From an abbot, however, the lord is to have only his ebediw; for, when an abbot dies, the community and the canons are to have his property.

28. Every dispute that may arise among themselves, is to be decided by judges from the community.

29. Every dispute that may take place between an abbot and a lord, is to be decided by the judges of the lord in conjunction with them.

30. If there be two lords, and each of them have ¹an army in the ²country, and a person come to solicit investiture of some immovable property, such as land; their grant is not a legal grant, and their investiture is not a legal investiture, until it shall be known which of them is sovereign of the country.

31. If an uchelwr place his son with an aillt to be nursed with the consent of his lord, and he be suffered to remain there a year and a day, or longer; that foster son shall possess the land of the aillt, after his decease, unless he have children; and, if there be children, he is to have the share of a brother.

32. If a Welch female be given in marriage to an alltud, a son of that female is entitled to a brother's share of the patrimony; but he is not to have a share of the privileged tyddyn, nor office, until the third descent, he, the son, and the grandson: thenceforward let him take his share of office, and of the privileged tyddyn when he may will; unless the alltud be a Saxon, or Irish nobleman, and he shall immediately have office, and share of the privileged tyddyn: for such, cattle without suretyship are to be paid; and they are called cattle without surety, on account of their being the share of the foreign father, 'imposed upon the kindred of the mother; since there is no kindred of the father to pay.'

10. If a person part with his land during his lifetime, and die, the ebediw, afterwards, is not to be imposed upon his land, but upon his personalty; and, if he have no personalty, the ebediw is extinct: or, if he have a son, he is to pay it.

11. Neither brothers, nor first cousins are to pay ebediw for extinguished land; since they cannot obtain it but by purchase.

12. The ebediw of every officer in the palace is six score pence: excepting these; to wit, the steward, the chief groom, the chief falconer, the chief huntsman, and the page of the chamber; the ebediw of each of whom is one pound.

13. Ebediw is due from an innate boneddig, an uchelwr, and an endowed person, although they may have no land in possession; that is, they are to pay according to the privilege of the land upon which they were born: and a father is not to pay for a son's such kind of due.

14. If a man have two lords, and hold land under each of them; he is to pay ebediw to each of them.

15. If a man hold two lands under one lord, he is to pay ebediw for the land which owes the largest due.

16. If a foreign traveller fall ill upon the road and die; upon what land soever he may die, twenty-four pence is to be paid for his ebediw; and his property, excepting that, goes to the king. If a female, her ebediw is sixteen pence.

17. The amobyr of the daughters of the several persons we have mentioned above, are of equal amount with the ebediws of their fathers.

18. No woman, in any case, is to pay an amobyr, but once, by law; and that she pays according to the privilege of the land upon which she was born: and no person is to pay it for her; unless her father, or her brothers, or one of her kindred, give her without taking surety for the amobyr; "in that case he must pay it," as ³⁰he did not take surety for it.

19. Whoever shall violate a woman, let him pay her amobyr; for a woman pays only one amobyr; as she never returns to the privilege of the lord of that land, nor to the privilege of her kindred, but assumes the privilege of the man with whom she has gone.

20. For three causes amobyr is paid: one of them is, for gift and investiture, before there be connexion; the second is, for notorious connexion, before either gift, or investiture; the third is, for pregnancy.

21. Three females who owe no amobyr: the daughter of an edling; the daughter of a king; and the daughter of a chief of the household: because their fathers owe no ebediw; except their ⁴horses, their ⁴favou-rite dogs, their hawks, and their arms: the daughter of a king owes none, as there is no one who can demand it: for a king is not to receive the amobyr of his own daughter.

22. No chief owes an ebediw; for, on account of his large due, he is free from every small due: unless it happen that he take land, and assume the privilege of ⁴an uchelwr; however bond may be the land he may obtain, it becomes as free as the land of an uchelwr: and from thence forwards he pays amobyr for his daughter, and his own ebediw, as an uchelwr shall pay; previously he paid only as the edling might pay.

23. The amobyr of the daughters of a chief of kindred, of a steward, and of a maer ⁴canghellor, is one pound /each.

26. The amobyr of the daughter of every chief of song, and his own ebediw, when invested by the lord with the title of chief of song, or office, is six score pence.

27. Every other minstrel whatever, whether he be an alltud, or a proprietor, pays his amobyr, and his ebediw, according to his privilege and due.

28. Every chief of song whom the lord shall invest with office, is to be provided by the king with an instrument; to wit, a harp to one, a crowd to another, and pipes to a third; to each according to his usage: and when they die they are to leave them to the king.

29. Every chief harper is to have twenty-four pence from the 'minstrels who have left' off the hair-strung harp, and who will to become recognized minstrels and suitors; and he is to have the share of two men from every gratuity they receive, either as a boon, or as a nuptial gift, whether he be present or not, if demanded by him: a nuptial gift is twenty-four pence, at the first marriage of a female, and that to the bards: and he is entitled to the service of the minstrels, as a man in authority over them.

and over which a mantle is to be spread to conceal it, lest it be seen, "and become a disgrace to the patrimony by being thus seen. 'Iorwerth the son of Madog' says, that the right meaning of inquiry as to a stock is this, namely, when a relative is a 'refuser to the murderer of his share of the galanas, and asking: 'Whence the stock I am related to thee?' Then it is necessary for the murderer to explain to him the stock from which he is derived, and his consanguinity, as we have already mentioned; and, in addition to that, to his having correlatives enough to testify to the truth of his assertion, because correlatives are proper evidences in such a case; for strangers are neither to connect a person with kindred, nor to separate him from kindred.

 twenty-one pence upon the murderer and his children, if he have any; and of this sum, a third upon the murderer, and two parts upon the children: if there be no children, let him pay it himself. And the third upon the father and the mother; that is another twenty-one pence; and of that two parts upon the father, and a third upon the mother. The third third upon the brothers and the sisters; that is another twenty-one pence; and of that two parts upon the brother, and one upon the sister.

12. If a person kill another by 'poison, he pays a double galanas, as it is a ferocious act; or be put to death in lieu of one galanas; and the manner of his execution to be at the option of the lord, either by hanging, or burning, or slaying; and payment of galanas for the other: if he deny, let him give a twofold denial for murder; that is, the oaths of six hundred men.

13. The persons who make poison to destroy others are to be banished, or put to death, at the option of the lord: if they deny, let them give the oaths of six hundred men.

IV. [OF SUITS.]

1. Whoever shall claim a thing, and come to the field, and there shrink from a trial, and prefer being silent to proceeding; the law allows him to be silent; because it is at his option, either to proceed with his claim, or not: and although the defendant may call for a decision, and, because of his shrinking, for sentence to be pronounced against him; the law does not deem it right to decide against him as to the property, or the claim; but, because he refused to proceed at the time fixed, to quit the field without further time. If he gave surety to abide by what the law may determine, and sit with his party, and commence pleading, and hear a reply, and then seek delay for aid, and say: 'I am entitled to it, as I have my option;' and then the defendant should say: 'Though it might have been at thy option, it is no longer so: since a settled thing accords not with choice: and hast thou not chosen to plead; and, therefore, I submit that, by law, thou oughtest not to retract:' the law

there sees, that he has no resource but to have the law promptly administered. If the plaintiff be quitting the field, let a cross be set up before him, that he do not go; and, if he should go, let the defendant call for sentence: and then the law provides, that he is barred from proceeding during the life of the lord who has supremacy over the field on that day; and three kine camlwrw to the king, ¹⁴if the lord be in the field; and, according to others, a double camlwrw.

Concerning a maiden wife.

2. A maiden wife is one who has been betrothed to a husband, she yet remaining a maid, and without consummation. If a rape be ²¹committed upon her, some say, that she is not entitled to cowyll; others say, that she is entitled to it: we, however, say, that whoever shall violate the virginity of a woman is to pay to her her cowyll.

3. Whoever shall occasion an abandoned female to become pregnant, it is not incumbent upon her to nurse the offspring ³⁰longer than' the swaddling month: for, since she has not had the support of the man, the law does not consider it right for her to be in want on his account.

4. Some say, that the surety, which a woman gives, is no surety: we say, that the surety which she may give, is a surety; although no woman can be a surety herself. When a woman shall deny a surety, ⁴¹men must deny it with her; for it is a man that denies.

5. What person soever, against whom there is a claim, refuses to appear in court, and to do right in regard to such claim; for every court in which he shall have so refused to appear, he is to pay a camlwrw.

6. If he appear in court, and unlawfully withdraw from the court, and the plaintiff call for the sentence of the law: the law there provides, that the cause for which the claim arose be awarded to the plaintiff; with a camlwrw to the lord upon the defendant, for quitting the field unlawfully; and that, during the life of the lord who that day had supremacy in the field, he shall have no redress as to the claim.

7. If he come to the field, and suffer pleading, and reply, and the law decide that he is cast; he can never renew the suit.

8. Whoever appears in the court of the lord in a cause, and his examination be commenced, if he take counsel before giving an answer, he is to be condemned: the defendant is to testify he did not deny; and on that account the law considers it acknowledged.

9. If a person sue during the blank days, he does not, on that account, either lose or gain; unless the issue of loss or gain be so stipulated; and, if it be so stipulated, the whole is lost: and, in like manner as to land and soil, in the times when the courts are to be shut.

10. Whoever may will to go to law with another, must, in the first place, give surety to abide the law; and afterwards sit legally. The following is the legal form of sitting in the lord's court, on the appointed day: the king is to sit with his back to the sun or to the weather, so that his face may not be to the weather, having his two elders, one on each side of him; then his gwrdaó around him; his judge of the court before him; the judge of the cymwd on one side of him; and the priest on the other side; and a passage fronting him, for him to go and come to his judgment seat: and the two parties to be ranged on each side of the passage; the two pleaders on each side of the way; the two suitors in the cause in the middle; and the two guiders on each extremity; the defendant's party with their right hand to the passage, and the plaintiff's party with their left hand to the passage; and the two apparitors behind the two pleaders.

11. Then "to ask the defendant: 'Who is thy pleader: who is thy guider?' Then he names them; and then let him be asked, whether he will abide loss or gain at their hands; and then let him say, he will.

Afterwards, let the 'plaintiff be asked, whether he also will submit his cause to the party on his side; and then it is right for him to say: 'I do so submit to loss and gain.' And then security is to be taken from them, to abide loss or gain, in respect to what we have mentioned above; and that is called a compact: and then the pleadings. Then let the judge, ⁶and the priest, and the apparitor, take the two pleadings, and recapitulate them, ⁶and go out and judge according to the two pleadings; and, if any interrogation be necessary, let them send a messenger to inquire: and, after that, let the judge return to the court, and let him take security to abide the sentence, and a' surety for his fee; and then let him pronounce sentence; and ever afterwards that claim remains established.

12. If silence be proclaimed in the field, and after that any one present violate the command, he is to pay three kine camlwrw; and that word is to be nugatory, both to himself and to the pleader.

13. If a person give money, or an animal, to another, and the receiver trade with that property, and gain by it, and he who owns the property demand the profit: we say, that he is not entitled to it, unless an agreement assign it to him: for, treasure is not to be stationary: and, 'therefore, he is to receive only what he gave to the other.

14. If a person come as an inmate to another person, having an animal, or other property, with him; when he departs, he is not to take with him the offspring, or dung, or 'crop, or any piece of furniture; nor any thing but what he brought with him to the house, if it remain, unless an

15. If a person have a 'sow, or other animal, stolen from him, and she rear offspring with the person who took her, and the owner know where his animal is, and should require both her and her offspring; he is entitled to her alone, if she be in existence; and, if not, he is to have nothing: for, 'treasure is not to be stationary.'

16. Whoever shall refuse right, from supposing that he is paramount in his claim, and that he may claim when he willeth, let him be allowed to refrain; and if he refrain for a year and a day, his claim has become a claim beyond the year; and for such, no right is ever due.

17. If a person illegally take a distress, let the distress be returned, and the cause remain on its prior footing: it is said, that he is not to obtain law who does not conform to it: the distress he illegally made has been restored; and the cause is on the footing it was at first.

18. If a person become a surety, and, before the termination of the suit, he should become leprous, or a monk, or blind; and should suppose that he is no longer responsible in law: we say, that he must fulfil his promise whilst he lives: and this is one of those cases where a son is not to stand in lieu of his father; because he has left none of his property to him, but his will only; therefore the son is not to be responsible as to any thing, excepting 'his will.'

19. If a person sue before the "time for deciding a case, it will not, thereby, avail him, until the time.'

20. If a person sue for a debt before the time, or in the blank days, he is neither to lose nor to gain, on that account, unless the time of decision be fixed to take place in them; and, if it be so fixed, all is lost: and in like manner with respect to causes for land and soil, during the times that the courts are to be shut.

21. If a maid declare that a certain man has committed a rape upon her, and the man deny it, and she then say, in reply: 'If thou hast not committed a rape upon me, I am still a virgin.' The law then adjudges her to be examined, and that by the edling.

22. If he find her become a woman, the accused cannot deny; and, therefore, let the man, whom she asserts violated her, pay her cowyll and her wyneb-werth to her, and her amobyr and her dilysrwyd to her lord.

23. If he find her to be a virgin, let her retain the privilege of a virgin; and she loses not her privilege on that account; to wit, because of proving her.

24. If a rape be committed upon a maid, and she become pregnant in consequence, and she know not who may be the father; and the lord demand her amobyr; and she say, that she is not to pay it, for a rape was committed upon her; and no woman, upon whom a rape is committed, is to pay amobyr: the law says, that, in that case, the amobyr to the lord is extinguished, since he was unable to preserve her from violation, and he bound to preserve her against violence and injustice. Although she be doubted in respect thereto, only her own oath is required, as to the truth of her assertion.

26. If a man assert that a woman is pregnant by him, and the woman deny it, and the man confess it, and the lord demand the amobyŷr; let the man, who confesses it, pay the amobyŷr: for there is no denial against a gwaesav.

27. If a person appraise a thing, which has a legal worth, and the appraisement be more than the legal worth; the judges are to ascertain whether it has been rightly, or wrongly appraised; and, if wrong, let him suffer the penalty of perjury, that is, a camlwrw of nine score pence to the lord; and the church to proceed against him.

28. If a person make a charge against another upon the relics, and after the charge he be cleared: that is called, in law, a manifest perjury; since it cannot be possible but that one of the oaths must be false.

29. If a person cause a fright to another, and from that fright the person lose his life; let it be inquired from what cause the fright arose, whether by a thing done to the man, or to another thing: and, if any thing done to another thing cause his death, there is to be no redress; if done to the person, let his galanas be paid.

30. Whoever shall bring relics into court, and the party opposed to him seek the use of the relics so brought by him; we say, that he is not to have those relics, until the pleadings be finished: afterwards, the relics are common to every one in the field.

31. Relics are not necessary in causes carried on in the church-yard, or in the church; because it is the place of the relics.

ther time is to be granted for procuring them, than during the continuance of the 'judge in the judgment seat ; and that is at 'his option.

33. If a judge deliver a wrong judgment, and its correctness be doubted, and a pledge be not offered against his decision before he rises from his seat ; unless it be his own will, he is not to accept the pledge ever afterwards.

34. The three mighties of the world : a lord ; a brave ; and a nonentity : the reason is, a lord is like a stone along the ice ; and a brave is an idiot, and an idiot is not to be ruled in any thing against his will ; and a person who is a non-entity is one without any property, and, therefore, property cannot be exacted where there is none.

35. There are three proofs respecting an animal : one is, whoever has his dog killed, and he assert it to be a sheep dog, he is to prove it ; the second is, if a person kill a dog because of its being mad, and the owner of the dog contradict him, and say, that it was not mad ; the person who killed it is to prove it was so, by showing that he had seen it attacking dogs and men, or that he had seen it with its tongue knawn ; the third is, a dog of mischievous habits ; if it be killed, it must be proved that it was accustomed to bite men, or of doing other injuries.

36. Where is it expressed in the law, that saraad is to be paid to two persons according to their privilege, and not according to their worth ? When the king's protection is violated, it is saraad to him, and it is to be compensated according to his privilege.

37. Is there a case where a judge shall deliver a sentence from his judgment-seat, as to which there is to be no mutual pledging ? There is : where a judge is one of the nine tavodiogs as to a sentence.

38. Is there a case where a stranger is to pay as great a proportion of a galanas as a brother ? Where a galanas is enforced from those who have become surety for the payment, after the mother of the murderer has affiliated him to another kindred.

40. Is there a case of theft to the value of three pounds by legal appraisement, which is not to be punished by dirwy, or loss of life ?

41. Is there a person who may be taken wherever found, and brought to the church, and there discharged ? A reputed son, whose father compensates the mischief he has committed, is the person.

42. If the head of a person be shorn while he is asleep, and without his knowledge, what is the punishment ? This is the punishment : the payment of a dirwy for fighting ; and his saraad to the man ; and the worth of the severed hair, and that is twenty-four pence.

43. Is there any blood of greater worth than twenty-four pence ? There is : the blood of a foetus.

The duty of the canghellor is to stand and to be in the place of the king during his presence, and during his absence, in every thing ; and his cross is an effective cross ; and his interdiction is an effective interdiction : and he is to receive from the king a gold ring, and a harp, and a throw-board, when he is invested with his office ; and he is to keep them whilst he shall live.

5. Thus long preserved woods are to be guarded: from the feast of St. John, when the swine go into the wood, until the fifteenth day after the kalends of January, and within that time the pannage ought to be completed. If a person find other swine in his wood during that time, though he should find only three animals, pannage is due: others say, that it is for ten animals: the law is, one out of the three animals; and the understanding is, as to the ten animals. And the swine, however, are to be in the wood, during that time, after they have completed the pannage.

6. The three indignities to a dead body: one of them is, when the body shall be killed, an attack and stroke thereon; the second is, despoiling it; the third is, striking it with the foot, when its connexion shall be enquired after: and those are equal to its saraad, excepting that they are not to be augmented: others call them the three saraads to a dead body.

7. The three calamities of a kindred: if a doubted son commit a crime, and, for that crime, it be attempted to deny him, he not having been previously denied; the law will not allow his being denied, until the kindred shall have made reparation for his crime: the second is, if a doubted son, who is under sufferance, be killed, and had not been received, his galanas is not to be paid; because as they received him not in his lifetime lawfully, they ought to obtain nothing by his death: the third is, if one person kill another, and a galanas fall upon the kindred, and before the arrival of the time of payment, the mother of the murderer shall affiliate him to another father; here the law says, that they are to pay the galanas, with the exception of the criminal's share: and hence the saying; he paid who gave surety.

8. In three cases a son cannot be denied by a kindred: one is, finding him in his lawful bed, and his being nurtured by the property of the man, without refusal, for a year and a day; the second is, giving a consideration for his being nurtured, although his mother may be a woman of bush and brake; the third is, receiving him in his mother church lawfully, as stated by the law.

9. There are three kinds of homages: the pale of a gwaesavwr; an aswynwr; and an adlamwr: if a proprietor become a man to another proprietor, and build, and till and plough, without agreement, and should repent and will to go from him, he is to pay him six score pence; and that is called the pale of a gwaesavwr; the second is, if a proprietor become a man to another proprietor, and will to go from him to his own patrimony, he is to pay him three score pence; and such is called an aswynwr; the third is, if a proprietor become an adlamwr with another proprietor for a year and a day, without agreement, in his service, and will to go from him, he is to pay him thirty pence; and such is called an adlamwr.

10. Neither dirwy, nor camlwrw, nor loss of life, is incurred for a wild animal; nor for an untrimmed tree, that is, a tree uncut at either end, and whether fresh, or decayed.

11. If it happen to a person, in throwing at any thing, that what he throws should, in its rebound, hit a person, so as to cause his death; and on that account his galanas and saraad be demanded; the law says, there is no insult therein; for it is a mischance: it is right, nevertheless, to pay galanas, on that account, if the person die; but, if he should live, he is to be compensated for his hurt: there is no insult, because there was neither onset, nor attack upon the wounded person, although hurt by the thing thrown; and, therefore, the law does not adjudge the two.

12. If a person transfix another with an arrow, and in its flight it go into another person; if they die, it is right to pay the galanas of both; but saraad is to be paid only to the first of them that was wounded.

hurt them, he is not to pay for them, if he drive them lawfully; that is, if he drive them whilst they are upon his own land: but if there be dogs with him, and his dogs kill the cattle, he is bound to pay for the act of his animal.

14. If, during his driving, there come his neighbour's dogs, and they should kill the cattle; it is right for every one to keep his animal against any breach of law; and, therefore, let each of them pay for his dog. If he drive them with the dogs beyond his own boundaries; he is to pay a camlwrw to the king; and the cattle to the owner.

15. The law as to a weapon is, to swear to it in the hand where it shall be seen; and, unless its delivery be resisted, there is to be neither dirwy, nor camlwrw for it, either upon the possessor, or upon the swearer; but it is to be received freely: but, if it be resisted, let it rest upon the privilege by which it shall be claimed.

16. If there be a dispute between two persons as to the procuring of relics to swear to a thing; the law says, that the person who has to urge the oath is to procure the relic: for the relic he may choose is to be there.

17. Three persons with whom the king is to share by thirds: the queen; the chief of the household; and the chief huntsman: the queen is entitled to a third from the king in every place, except in a border-country; out of the spoil, taken by the household, the chief of the household is to have the share of two men of the third of what comes to the king; the chief huntsman is to have the share of two men of the skins of hunted animals, and the third of the king's share. The king is to have, from every border-country spoil, the third, and the gold, and the silver, and the treasure, and the bugle-horns, and the precious stones, and the garments on which there may be orles.

18. Every thing that a proprietor shall find concealed in his land, excepting gold and silver, belongs to himself; for the gold and the silver belong to the king.

19. Whoever shall obtain sanctuary after committing treason against the lord, and seek to reconcile himself in the way the law may direct; to such the law adjudges the forfeiture of his patrimony, although he shall escape with life, by the sanctuary he has obtained.

20. If a person bear a relic, and have arms in his hand, and he seek to make use of them, he is not entitled to his relic; but, if he trust to his relic, let his arms be taken from him, and let them be kept where they shall not be lost.

21. Whoever may will not to redress the injury committed with his arms, let him deposit them in a public place, and place them under the protection of God, and the protection of the lord; and, unless he so deposit them, let him make redress.

22. If a person commit a public wrong, and then seek to deny it, in order to thwart the proceedings; the law will not allow him to do it, either by denial, or by witnesses; for public testimony is more effective than that of any specific number.

23. If two persons be walking through a wood, and a branch, by the passing of the foremost, should strike the eye of the hindmost, unwarned; let him be paid for his eye, if he lose it: but, if the other warned him, he is not to pay.

24. If there be two persons walking together, and the foremost find a hoard, let him share it equally with the hindmost: but, if the hindmost shall find it, the foremost is entitled to nothing; since he had passed by it.

25. If one brother build before the other, he is not to depart from the place where he built; but is to give to the other a side and end instead of that: a side and end imply, on the side, or end of the land whereon the other shall be seated. And,

II. [OF CHOOSING A KING.]

1. After the taking of the crown and sceptre of London from the nation of the Cymry, and their expulsion from Lloegyr, they instituted an enquiry to see who of them should be supreme king. The place they appointed was on the Maelgwn sand at Aber Dyvi; and thereto came the men of Gwynedd, the men of Powys, the men of South Wales, of Reinwg, of Morganwg, and of Seisyllwg. And there Maeldav the elder, the son of Ynhwch Unachen, chief of Moel Esgidion in Meirionydd, placed a

⁵ A gloss in a ms. of the Laws, of the 13th century, written for a descendant of Maeldav, observes, that Maeldav the elder, was the son of Ynhwch Vnarchen, on of Ysbwys, son of Ysbwch; which two last came from Spain with Uthyr and Emrys, and were the first that settled at Moel Esgidion: and, to correct erroneous accounts, it adds, that Maeldav lord of Pennardd in Arvon, was the son of Menwyd, son of Ririd, son of Ruol, son of Tegog, son of Einion Yrth, son of Cunedda Wledig, and lived in the time of Iago (the third in descent from Maelgwn).

⁶ The residence of Ynhwch was at Caerynwch, near Dolgelli in the shire of Meirionydd. Moel Esgidion is the hill at the back of it.

chair composed of waxed wings under Maelgwn; so when the tide flowed, no one was able to remain, excepting Maelgwn, because of his chair. And by that means Maelgwn became supreme king, with Aberffraw for his principal court; and the earl of Mathrafal, and the earl of Dinevwr, and the earl of Caerllion⁴ subject to him; and his word paramount over all; and his law paramount, and he not bound to observe their law. And it was on account of Maeldav the elder, that Penardd acquired its privilege, and to be the eldest canghellor-ship.

2. If a person do a wrong in the cymwd of which he is a native, and be taken therein; let him redress in the cymwd the wrong he does.

3. If he do a wrong within his own cymwd, and be taken in another cymwd; let him be sent to his own cymwd to make satisfaction for the wrong he does.

4. If a person do a wrong in a cymwd of which he is not a native; let him there make satisfaction to the person to whom he did the wrong: and, if he be there caught, let his dirwy, and his camlwrw go to his own raglaw.

5. If a person do a wrong in a cymwd of which he is not a native, he being established and having his property there; if he be there caught, let his dirwy, and his camlwrw go to the raglaw of that cymwd.

6. If a person do a wrong in a cymwd of which he is not a native, and be taken in a cymwd of which he is not a native; let him be sent to the cymwd of which he is a native to do right for the wrong. What we have above said is right, if the persons be of the same lordship.

7. If a person do a wrong in another lordship; let him make satisfaction in that where he does the wrong.

8. If a person be established in another country, other than the one whereof he may be a native, and seek to obtain the privilege of his own country in that; he is not to have it: because it is more just to destroy the privilege of one person, than the privilege of the country.

36. If a person be born with the members of ■ man and those of a woman, and it be doubtful of which it may make use; some say, that according to such as it principally may use, its privilege is to rank; but, if it make use of each, the law says, that it is to rank with the highest privilege, and that is the privilege of a man: and, if it should become pregnant, the offspring is to have the patrimony of the man who caused the pregnancy; but, if it should make a woman pregnant, the son is then to obtain its patrimony.

to him, either by gift, or by borrowing, or by exchange, with surety thereon, and he take it not, lest he should lose his property; the law says, that he is to prove the property came from the arwaessav, either by surety, or by witnesses: because, although it was sworn to as a theft in the first hand, he does not charge it as theft upon the arwaessav; and, therefore, he can make use of his surety, and his evidences.

50. The three severe losses of a kindred: one is, when a murderer, after his kindred shall have paid two thirds of the galanas, he also having paid his third unto one penny, be killed on its account by his enemies; the law being, to kill him for that one penny; the kindred thus losing their property, and their kin, it is called the severe loss of a kindred: the second is, after the kindred shall have paid their share of the galanas, and the murderer have nothing wherewith to pay his share, and he be banished to another country; thus losing their kin: the third is, if a person be charged with having killed another, and he deny it not, although he may be innocent; and on that account he be killed; the law suffers it; and, for the killing of their kin, being innocent, there is the severe loss of the kindred: others call it the dire fall of galanas.

51. If a person swear to a thing stolen in the hand of another person, and the thing be without legal worth thereon; and on that account the defender of the thief, although that thing be worth much, seek to "protect him;" since no one is to be put to death for what shall be of less worth than four pence, the claimant is a second time to swear that he would not part with his property without so much and so much: and, if the appraisement be higher than four pence, let the thief forfeit life on account of the property, as if it had a legal worth; and, if the appraisement be lower than four pence, let him be a saleable thief.

52. There is one son who is not necessitated to wait the death of his father to be invested with his inheritance: the son of a man upon register land; since his share of the erw of his father is not more than that of the most distant man in the trev. 53. The blind is not to appraise; since there can be no appraisement in absence; and he sees not what he is to swear to: nevertheless he is to charge; and according to his charge let the lord be absolute, and let him order him what belongs to him.

54. None can urge galanas, but such as are bound to pay it with the murderer, and to receive it.

55. If a woman kill a person, let her be criminal, as if a man; and she is to have spear penny, unless she have property wherewith to pay: and that is the only person who is to receive a spear penny, and is not to pay one.

56. If two sons be born at one birth, and that birth the latest of the father's children; let the mother know which is born last of them, so as to have the lawful homestead: and the word of their mother is conclusive respecting them.

57. If it be not known which is first, which last of them, yet it is certain that birth is the last; and, therefore, they are to have the privileged homestead shared between them: others say, unless he knows he is the youngest son, he is not entitled to the ⁴³privilege of the youngest son.

58. If the son of an alltud by a boneddig woman kill a person, his father and mother being alive, and galanas fall upon him; let the two parts be upon the mother, and the third upon the father: for, she is to be in the place of a father.

59. If a daughter be denied by a kindred, and she be betrothed to a husband, and there be a contention respecting her amobyr; the law says, that it is the king who is entitled to it, for it is the king's waif; and, if the ⁴⁴issue be a Welsh female, her amobyr is to be equal to that of the daughter of an innate boneddig, that is, four score pence. If her mother be an alltud female, her amobyr is to be equal to the amobyr of the daughter of an alltud, that is, twenty-four pence. And so the ebediw of a son that is denied is rated, unless he increase in privilege, so that his ebediw shall be augmented.

61. If a surety, acknowledged by the two parties, shall be partial before acknowledging his suretiship, and be objected to by one party who shall testify to his being partial; the law says, he is to pay the debt, since he has not accomplished the duties of a surety.

62. If it chance to a surety to forget whether he be a surety, or not, let a delay of three days be allowed him to refresh his memory; and, if it do not occur to his memory on the third day, and he do not deny his surety, let him pay the whole of the debt.

63. If there be a surety acknowledged by the two parties, and one party say, that he is surety for a large sum, and the other say, that it is for a small sum, the surety saying that he does not remember which; let the defendant pay what he has acknowledged to be due, and let the surety pay so much as to make up to the plaintiff his whole claim.

64. If a surety pledge his own property, to avoid compulsion upon the debtor; let that be instead of payment to the plaintiff.

65. If a person deny a surety, and cannot obtain a raith to deny it, except his brothers, and the plaintiff urge that there ought to be only two parts of the kindred of the father, and the third of the kindred of the mother; the law says, that the brothers alone shall stand to deny surety, because there can be no objection to a raith-man for a surety, if he be bound to pay galanas, and to receive it along with him; and brothers can make oath that they are to pay galanas, and to receive it along with him.

66. If a person give surety to another upon a debt, and there be in the possession of the person only joint property with another; the law says, that the surety ought not to give a pledge of the joint property, until it be shared; and the lord is to be absolute in compelling him to share it.

67. If there be an acknowledged surety for a debt, and the plaintiff say that it is for three score pence, and the defendant say that it is for twenty pence, and the surety say that it is for one pound; the law adjudges, that the defendant is to pay only what he speaks to, since the surety and the plaintiff were not unanimous; and let the surety pay to the plaintiff the greater sum that he mentioned, unless he may be able to compel: if the surety return less than the amount, let the defendant pay what he confessed to; since the surety has not returned either of the other two sums.

68. If there be a dispute concerning a debt, for which there are two acknowledged sureties, and the plaintiff say that the debt is three score pence, and the defendant say that it is twenty pence, and then apply to the sureties for a determination; and one make a return of its being three score pence, and the other, of its being twenty pence: the law adjudges, the plaintiff and defendant having united to leave the determination to arbitrators, who do not agree in their return, and make none, as the two parties agreed only in their separate return, that, unless the sureties remember, the plaintiff is only to be paid the twenty pence acknowledged by the defendant; not on account of the return by the surety, but on account of his own acknowledgment.

69. If one of the officers of the court deny a surety, or a man of the household who shall be at the king's table; in the king's chapel he is to deny it; because it is there he receives his holy water and sacramental bread.

70. If a man without a residence, only upon progress, or an innate boneddig, deny a surety; the law says, that it is in the church where the law establishes him as a parishioner, he is to deny it; since he has no more claim to his holy water and sacramental bread in one church than in another.

71. If a suit of surety and debtor come before a judge, and the plaintiff, the surety, and the debtor be present; and the plaintiff make his claim, and the defendant answer that he is not bound to reply to him that day, on account of its being after mid-day, and that law proceeding is not to begin after mid-day; and the plaintiff say, that it is a suit of surety and debtor, and appeal to the law, that where there shall be a plaintiff, a defendant, and a surety present before a judge, law is immediate: then the law says, that in what case soever the law shall be restricted, as in the blank days, or law that may fall on a Sunday, or on a Monday, or law as to landed property in harvest time and spring, that the restraint of those times is greater than a suit of surety and debtor; since the proceedings cannot in those times be immediate: there are no other causes to delay them, but three: the horn of the king; a plaint of violence; and a plaint of theft.

72. The raith of a thief is to be so near akin to him, as to pay and to receive galanas along with him.

73. If a judge take a fee, or a surety for a fee, to attend a cause; the law says, that he cannot be a judge in that cause, ¹unless he deny, and although he may deny, ²if it can be proved against him; for a judge is only entitled to a lawful fee, and that is not lawful.

74. A judge is not to take a fee for any thing, until he shall have pronounced the sentence he is to give; and, before declaring it, let him take surety for his fee; and, if he do not then take it, let him be without any thing.

75. A judge is not to be objected to for any thing, but for what he may do against law in a cause in progress; for his tongue is free, and there is a lawful penalty for wrong doing.

76. If a plaintiff and defendant shall have mutually spoken of law, before a judge, and one of them fail, and endeavour to escape, from there having been no compact, nor loss nor gain; the law says, that nothing is binding of what is said by plaintiff and defendant before a judge; if others plead for them, before judges, what they may say is unavailing.

77. If a pleader be seated, and ¹shall then leave his place; the law says, that he is not to come back to that place; and that he loses the suit he may be supporting: ²and he is liable to no other penalty.

78. If a person quit the field unlawfully, it is right to call him three times, before pronouncing judgment against him; and, if he come at the third time, he is not to forfeit his claim, nor to be criminal, on that account.

79. If an alltud, having a wife with agweddi, seek to part from his lord, and she willeth that her argyvreu should not be shared; some say, that she is to separate from her husband, and to go, with what belongs to her, free and secure: the law, however, says, that she is not to separate from the husband, but for an unlawful act done by him, and that it is not unlawful for him to give his lord his due; and, on that account, let what is in their possession be equally shared.

80. If a ship be wrecked before payment of toll, the property belongs to the king; but, if it be wrecked after payment of toll, nothing is due; for the privilege of alltuds is attached to them thenceforth: and what length of time soever thenceforth it shall be at anchor, there is to be nothing due.

81. A son cannot be affiliated from the dead, nor be affiliated to the dead; for, what son soever a man shall receive in his lifetime lawfully, cannot, on his death, be affiliated from him; and what son soever a person shall reject in his lifetime, is not to be affiliated to him on his death.

82. What son soever shall remain without being received, and without being rejected; the law leaves it to the kindred to perform what is due of them concerning him.

83. If judges and parties be seated, and law proceedings begun, and a pleader arise, by the permission of the lord, or raglaw, and the other party resist it; the judge only is to give permission.

84. If there be law proceeding between two persons, and the judges go out to adjudge sentence; and it be necessary to admit interrogation, and it be supposed that the pleadings are at a stand on account of the interrogation; there is only to be admitted what the judge has asked.

85. If two persons complain, each against the other, and one shall have received many strokes, and the other have received only one; the law will not allow but that the two saraads are of the same character, unless there shall be blood, or wound, upon one of them; and, if there be, let the worth of his blood be paid to him.

86. If two persons shall have lost a similar thing, and one of them should light upon it, and swear to it, if there be none to debar him of it, let him take it; but, if the other should swear to it in his hand, let him be the owner of it; and let the law be open to the other.

87. If a person suppose that no plaint is effective, unless it be preferred on the day whereon the ground of the plaint shall have originated; the law says, it is a plaint in effect to the end of a year and a day; excepting as to fighting, and mutual saraad.

property: the law says, he promised he would not have one of the three kine, when he said: 'The one I will not have:' therefore, let the first and second choice be to the defendant, and the third to the plaintiff.

89. If a person say, on the first day he shall claim land and soil, that it is a day of loss or gain; and that should there be any to doubt it, there are enough for him who know it; and the other say, that he would appeal to the judge and the lord, that there had never been any claim against him until that day; and appeal to the law, that there could be no claim against him in the absence of those men: thereupon, it is more just to believe the judge and the lord, than the evidences of the plaintiff; because evidences are ineffective without them.

90. If an alltud assume orders, or hospitalry, or other function, without the permission of his lord, that will not release him from his bondage; and the church should proceed for its disrespect.

91. If a person be excommunicated, whatever the cause for which he may be excommunicated, and the lord willeth his spoil on the spot; the law says, that he is not to suffer spoliation, until he shall have been excommunicated a month and a day.

92. If a scholar commit a theft, and it be adjudged to degrade him according to the law of the synod; the law adjudges, that 'his life is not to be forfeited' on account of that deed; since there ought not to be two punishments for one cause.

93. If a lord will not allow right to a person, for land and soil, or other property; the law says, that so long as he may be debarred of it, it is not a claim beyond the year, although the person be in the country where his claim is, it is timely when sued for.

94. If many persons claim one thing, and appoint a representative of their claim; and the defendant procure evidences of there having been previously a compromise of that claim; and the plaintiff seek to object to those evidences, by causes of objection between them and his party: the law will not allow an objection between any of the evidences and his party, but as to himself; because he is the representative of the claim.

95. No one can liberate an alltud, but during his own life, except by his departure to his own country; and although he may liberate him in his day, the claim will be fresh for the son, after his father, when he shall be minded to claim.

96. If a person give an indemnity to another, and afterwards will to deny it; the law decides, if there be a counter oath thereon by the plaintiff, that it is of the same character as the denial of bridew.

97. What church land soever shall have been occupied during the life of a father, and grandfather, and great grandfather, the fourth being in possession, and paying tunc and ebediw to the abbot, without disturbance, without injury by him who may claim of him, becomes an inheritor of that land: disturbance and injury is, the burning of houses, or the killing of a person: if done by a proprietor he loses nothing by this, although the occupier be a non-proprietor. But one thing causes the removal of every body, court as well as church: a cry over the abyss, in behalf of him who is lapsing, either while a hostage, or for murder, to a state of alienism: that causes a removal, either from part, or from the whole.

98. Determining boundary is free at any time, whether the law be shut or open, unless there be the yielding of a randir therein. And to the church belongs to fix boundary to the court; and the court to the country, and the maer of the court is to swear for them. If an abbot is to meer the land of his own court, a habited monk is to swear for him. If it be two lands coequal in privilege, coequal in extent, the oldest men in common are to assign its boundary; and, if they cannot effect it, the matter in contention is to be equally shared. If the two lands be of coequal privilege, and the conservancy of the one party be longer than that of the other thereon, let the longest in conservancy fix the boundary.

causes : one is, that only one amobyr is due from a woman, and she has paid that ; the second is, that she has not married since she was affiliated to her new father ; and what thing soever she may have done among the family she was formerly in, neither claim, nor sur-claim is to follow her into the other family into which she has come. But, if she have not paid her amobyr to the lord of her former father, let her pay to the lord of the new father ; since the nuptials are not complete until her amobyr shall be paid.

101. If there be joint property among many persons, and it be stolen ; and every one of them separately sue for the theft, supposing there is to be a denial by the same person to the charge of each ; the law says, that they are to make one of them the representative of the claim to prosecute on account of them all, and to him it is right to answer.

102. If many persons lose their property, and that none of them are conjointly interested in the property ; and they be minded to prosecute their charge upon the same person, in the same pleadings, and at the same time ; the law says, that they are not entitled to a joint answer, but the first who has sued is first to have an answer lawfully given him ; and afterwards, from next to next, until the pleadings of every one of them are completed.

103. If an alltud commit a theft, and, before he be suspected, he should go from his lord, and become subject to another ; and then the owner of the property should come, and charge it as a theft upon him, and he avouch by a denial ; it is right for his lord to defend him. If it be said by his then lord, that he is not bound to defend him, but for theft he might commit since he became a man to him ; the alltud so falls under the law of theft, unless he obtain a lord who will exculpate him.

104. If a thief be found, with theft in his possession, and he who shall catch him be not the owner of the property, and there come no other owner to find it in his hand ; let him be liberated, on his oath to the property being his own.

105. If an owner be found, who shall swear to it in his hand, and say it was taken from him by stealth ; although he may not charge it as theft upon the person in possession of it, yet he must procure a lawful arddelw that shall exonerate him from the theft, or else fall under the law of theft. caught him deny that, let the theft revert to him; but, if he deny it, let the possessor of it fall under the law of theft. But if he say, that he is innocent of the theft, whatsoever shall be said of him, and seek no other arddelw than his innocence; it is right to allow him his arddelw, until it fail, and that is a raith.

106. If theft be charged upon a person, and a raith be required from him, and he would rather compromise with the lord, than undergo a raith; the lord is not to compromise with him, but on the restoration of the property to the loser; since the lord has nothing to do with him, but on his being guilty, and he is guilty, when he refuses the raith: and, therefore, the loser is to have his property; and thereupon punishment by the lord; and it is fair for the guilty to undergo it.

107. If a person suppose that the loser is to be reimbursed from the property which goes to the lord; he is not: the loser is to have his own from the person who caused the loss; and for causing the loss the punishment is inflicted by the lord.

108. Some say, that a contract cannot be broken, for that a contract is like a vow; and every vow, although broken, is to be reassumed and kept anew; and in like manner a contract, by indemnifying him with whom it shall be broken. The law says, whosoever shall withdraw himself from a thing lawfully, notwithstanding the magnitude of his engagement, whether it be a contract, or any thing else, has no claim upon that again, since he has broken his obligation; and that it is a rejection of a contract to break it: the person with whom it shall be broken can, however, sue him, if he will; for he did not break it, and did not refuse it: and, therefore, he is entitled to his position, and his contract again.

109. If a raith be adjudged on a person for theft, and to consist of nod-men; and, before the appointed time of the raith, one of the nod-men should die, and that should be imagined by the loser to be a frustration to him; the law says, it is no frustration in any case where death shall intervene, unless in the day of loss or gain; or where evidences shall be promised by a person himself: in those two cases, if evidences die, before the appointed time, it is a frustration to him; for, he himself promised what he has not been able to obtain.

shall cause to be executed for theft; nor of the property of his wife, and his sons, unto the age of fourteen years; nor any thing but the life of the person he shall execute.

111. If a person do saraad to an adventitious bondman, twenty-four pence is his saraad: an adventitious bondman is, one who shall be in the house of an uchelwr, at spade and fork; and such a one is a domestic bondman, who shall remain with the uchelwr unbought, uninvited: and the worth of such a one is twice as much as that of a bondman who shall be bought.

112. If a bondman be killed, whether he be adventitious or otherwise, or stolen, and it be denied; the oaths of twenty-four men are to deny it, and the one half to be nodmen: for, as to every theft, the one half are to be nod-men.

113. If an adventitious bondman come to the house of an uchelwr, and take land of him, and hold a house, and pay tunc, and gwestva to his lord; his worth is to be half the worth of the king's alltud from that time forth, as the alltud of a privileged uchelwr.

114. If there be joint meering between two possessors of croziers, whether they be abbots, or bishops; the highest in privilege has the right of meering: if they be co-equal, he who has prior occupancy has the right of meering, by his oath upon his crozier and his gospel, which are to be at the place when they shall be sworn upon.

115. The wyneb-werth of every person is of equal amount with his saraad; excepting that wyneb-werth is not to be augmented.

116. If a person claim an alltud, and say, that he is undoubtedly his, and that should there be any to doubt it, there are enough for him who know it; and the alltud answer, that although he might be an alltud, he was not an alltud to him; the law thereupon adjudges the proof on the plaintiff; and, if he succeed, let him take the alltud. If the alltud say, that he is not to answer him for that, on account of his being a due boneddig, and, if there be who doubt it, that there are for him enough who know it; and he appeal to the law, that a due boneddig is not to answer to a claim of alienism; the law there says, that his arddelw and his proof rest with him. The kind of proof required of him is, other boneddigs related to him; because he says he is a boneddig: and that is called untoward law. The import of untoward law is this: a case where the defendant shall turn the proof from the plaintiff to his own side, like turning law to the opposite side: and it is on that account called untoward law.

117. In what case soever one relative shall be put with another as a raith-man, or as a witness; and the defendant doubt them to be relatives, and so seek to object to them; the law says, if they make oath to their being so near of kindred as to pay galanas, that he is not to object to them.

118. No ebediw is due from the judge of the court; because he is free from every demand by his lord.

119. If it happen that three or four persons be in company, and one stab the other, once, or twice, or thrice; the persons present are to pay dirwy to the lord: they are not to pay, however, for seeing him stabbed once; for that might be done suddenly.

120. If it be supposed that the privilege of a woman who may be abducted, or the privilege of a woman slept with, from three nights onward is not to follow the privilege of the man, because there was not gift of kindred respecting her; and on that account she is supposed to be on the privilege of her kindred; the law says, that after a woman has acquired agweddi, her privilege is to merge in the privilege of the man from whom she acquires agweddi; and that she cannot leave him, unless she be minded to lose her agweddi; and that he too cannot put her away, but with payment of her agweddi. The agweddi of every wife of that kind is, three bullocks with horns and ears of equal length: and, as the law says, the privilege of those wives accords with the privilege of their husbands.

121. If theft be found in the hand of a person, and when he shall be caught, he find his arwaesav, whether a priest, or other graduate, or any religious person, and such one come to take it from his hand; the law says, that it is not to be given to him, since he is not to surrender himself to the law of the lord, he having relics upon him: that is, relics to the one are his degrees; and to the other, his sacred vestments; and on that account they cannot assume the character of a thief; and, therefore, it is, that the law will not allow them to be arwaesavs for theft; since the law of theft is not to be removed from the court of a lord to the chapter of a bishop.

122. If there be a dispute between two parties concerning land and soil, and the lord interdict the land, until the dispute be ended; and, notwithstanding that interdiction, one of the parties make use of the land, either by building, or tillage; the law says, it is liable to the same penalty as meer breach. the worth of the right foot of the ploughman, and the worth of the left hand of the driver, are due to the lord. If he build, or make other use of it, the usufruct belongs to the lord, because he was the guardian of it, when it was made use of; and a camlwrw to the lord; and the land to be of the same privilege as it was before.

123. If an alltud come and become the king's man, and land be given to him, and he occupy the land during his life, and his son, and his grandson, and his great grandson, during their lives; that great grandson will be a proprietor from thenceforth; and after that the privilege of an alltud ought not to attach to him, but the privilege of a man that shall possess land, and the privilege of a Cymro.

124. If that great grandson afterwards give his daughter to an alltud; the son of that daughter is entitled to maternity, with the children of such great grandson; they are not entitled, however, from the first alltuds, nor from their sons, nor their grandsons, for they were not proprietors: and, until an alltud shall ascend to be a proprietor, he has the privilege of the king's alltud.

125. If an alltud, when he comes from his country, become a man to an uchelwr, and from him go to another; and he proceed, and his son after him, and his grandson, and his great grandson, and his "goresgynydd," from one uchelwr to another, without settling in any place more than another; let them be under the privilege of alltuds, so long as they shall be thus without settling.

126. If an alltud become a man to an uchelwr, and be with him until his death; and the son of the alltud be with the son of the uchelwr; and the grandson of the alltud with the grandson of the uchelwr; and the great grandson of the alltud with the great grandson of the uchelwr; that fourth uchelwr will be a proprietor over the great grandson of the alltud, and his heirs proprietors of the heirs of that great grandson for ever: and thenceforth, they are not to go to the country whence they are derived, away from their proprietary lord; ¹on account of their having lost the time when they were to go, if they willed to go.

127. says, that the defendant may choose his arddelw out of the three, either what he spake himself, or that spoken by his pleader, or that spoken by his guider.

128. If there be a suit between two persons, and the plaintiff claim, in the presence of the judge, and the defendant answer that he ought not to proceed at law on that day, being past mid-day, and that there ought to be no law proceedings after mid-day, nor commencement of any; and the plaintiff should say, that it was not mid-day; and, therefore, appeal to the law, that he was entitled to an answer; the law says, that it is incumbent upon the judges first to decide between them whether it be mid-day or not, by their oaths that it seemed most likely to them as they decided. And, if it be before mid-day, the law is to be allowed to proceed; if after mid-day, let it be put off till next morning.

129. If there be a thing jointly between two persons, and each of them will to share it; and they dispute which should share, which should choose; the law says, that they are both to share first, and afterwards, let each of them share the portion that came to him, and then let each one choose from the shares of the other: and that is called the share of the law of agreement. Others say, that the youngest is to share, and the eldest is to choose; unless the privilege of the youngest shall be higher. If it be not known which is highest, which is lowest, as to privilege; who the eldest, who the youngest; an equation is to take place between them; and then the sharing we have mentioned above is due.

130. If there be a thing jointly between two persons, and the one will to have it shared, and the other will it not to be shared; let the one share who is for sharing, and let the other choose.

131. If there be an indivisible thing jointly between two persons, or between more persons; as an ox, or a cow, or a horse, or other thing that cannot be shared or divided; and some will to share it, and others do not will; the person who wills to share is to fix its worth, and let the person who wills not to share either take the animal, and pay the valuation to the sharer; or leave the animal to the sharer, and take from him the valuation. If they will not to do so, the lord is to compel them: for none are to co-participate but whilst they be so minded. If, however, they cannot obtain the valuation, it is right for them to participate, until others can have their choice: and it is not right either to divide the animal, or to render it useless, although jointly owned.

132. If there be joint property among many persons, and one will to share, and the others do not will to share; it is right for it to be shared by him who wills it, and for every body to choose before him; and let them choose from eldest to eldest, if they be of equal privilege; and unless they be, let him choose who is of highest privilege.

133. If a person be minded to occasion disturbance, or injury, concerning land and soil, to another, let him do it upon the land to which the claim is; and, if he do it upon land whereon there is no claim, let him pay for what he does; since he is only to lay waste the land whereto there is a claim. Disturbance consists in burning of houses, or breaking of ploughs: that is disturbance. Injury is, frequent plaint to country and lord: although he may not obtain right for year and years, his claim is not extinguished, notwithstanding the time he has been debarred of it.

134. For a claim for money, or cattle, or other property, it is not right to cause disturbance, but injury; and to make the claim yearly: and, if there be one year without claiming it, and a day over, if the person be in the same country with his claim; it is a claim beyond a year thenceforth, and becomes extinguished.

135. If there be a mutual meering between two persons, and the plaintiff say, that, by privilege, he is to meer; unless the defendant doubt it, let him show his meer; but, if the defendant doubt it, let law proceeding take place between them as to their privilege; and he to whom the privilege shall be adjudged, let him show his meer.

136. If a person exercise compulsion over another; as causing him to acknowledge himself criminal; or to certify property, against his will; or to permit, against his will, disadvantage to be done to him; and he afterwards prefer that against him in law; the law says, that what is done through compulsion is not to stand, because compulsion is equal to spoliation; and, as spoliation is to be restored, in like manner, what is done through compulsion is to be restored.

137. If theft be charged upon a person, and before the time for the raith the person die, and leave property; and the lord willeth to take his property, since he had not the raith; the law says, that the lord is entitled to his property, to the extent of seven pounds; for, to that he would be entitled, unless he obtained the raith: if there be more property than seven pounds, it is to be left for his children, to pay his daered and his debts.

138. If he left no property, and the lord willeth to sue his son for that amount, since he obtained not the raith; the law says, that for theft the criminal only is to be hanged; and a raith is not to be adjudged upon any one, but upon such one as shall be proceeded against by an owner; and since the owner charged nothing against the son of the person, he is free from any claim for the raith of his father.

139. If theft be found in the hand of the alltud of an uchelwr, and before mutual law proceeding he leave him, and so do not give himself up to the law, and the theft be of such amount that his life ought to be forfeited; and, therefore, as he does not give himself up to the law, the lord willeth the property from the uchelwr, who is lord over the alltud; and the uchelwr will to defend the property, unless the law shall say that he ought to have it: the law says, that the life of the thief is forfeited by his contumacy in not giving himself up to the law; and, according to the amount of the property found in his possession, that he is liable to be a banished man; and that the lord and his kingdom are in pursuit of him until found; and, therefore, that the law sees not that there are to be two punishments for the same act: that is, executing the man, and taking the property likewise: and the law says, that if the property had been obtained, then he ought, conjointly with his uchelwr, to have made his peace on account of the property.

140. These are the cases wherein testimony is required as to an animal: one is, if a person kill the dog of another, and he who may own the dog say it is a shepherd dog, and the other doubt it; it is necessary for the owner of the dog to have a neighbour above him, and another below him, to warrant its being a shepherd dog: the second is, if a dog do mischief once, or twice, or thrice; and it be exculpated three times; and the fourth time its owner be minded to exculpate it; the law says, that the person to whom the injury has been done is to prove its being accustomed to mischief, if he can; because from the third time onward it is adjudged to be accustomed: the third is, if a person kill a mad dog; and the owner of the dog say it was not mad; the law says, that he who killed the dog is to prove its being mad, of having seen it fighting with dogs, or pursuing men, or of having knawed its tongue; and, if it be seen in that state, there is liberty to kill it, for it is mad.

141. The space of time wherein the huntsmen are entitled to the skins of animals, without allotting a third to the king, is from the kalends of winter until the ninth day after the kalends of January.

142. If a man be taken in battle, and the men of two lords be present at the taking of him, the lord of the first who shall lay his hand upon him is to own the prisoner: if they be the men of one lord, the first who shall lay his hand upon him owns his spoil; since the law does not share in that instance.

143. If a person leave his corn without being reaped, or without being gathered together, until the ninth day after the kalends of winter, and will to impound cattle found thereon thenceforth; the law says, it is not to be permitted: since the privilege of corn is not to be continued from one year into the other.

144. If there be an alltud of a kindred, he is entitled to a raith, as upon a Cymro. An alltud of a kindred is, an alltud whose parents have been in Cymru, until there have arisen brothers, cousins, second cousins, and third cousins, and nephews, to each of those. They are not thenceforth to go to the country from whence they originated, because they are a kindred; and there is no person of a kindred who is not entitled to have a raith adjudged to him; and that number of persons form a kindred: and there is no one who has not been primarily an advenient man; and all ultimately become proprietors, and form kindred, if they continue in Cymru until the fourth descent.

145. These are cases wherein four-pences are without augmentation: for a heifer's calf, and its teat, and its horn, and its eye, and its tail; and a wing swarm; and a house cur; and an orphan colt; and the increase money upon a horse, the first day it shall be bridled; and upon an ox, the first day it shall be put under a yoke; and upon a heifer, the first day it shall take the bull, the ninth day of August; and groom-silver; and for riding a horse without permission; and for a roebuck; and for a roe; and for a broken bone.

146. Whoever may be passing on the killing of a person, is to pay three kine camlwrw to the king; with the oaths of a hundred men to the kindred, that he came not in contact with his blood; but saw his being killed, and did not defend him.

If a wife speak an ireful word to her husband; such as wishing drivel upon his beard, or dirt in his teeth, or call him a "cur; she is to pay him three kine camlwrw, for he is lord over her: or, if she like it better, to be struck three strokes with a rod of the length of the fore arm of her husband, and of the thickness of his long finger, and that wheresoever he may will, excepting her head.

149. The throw-board of the king is six score pence in value, and it is thus shared: three score upon the white men; and three score upon the king with his men; to be thus shared, thirty pence upon the king, and thirty upon his men, that is, three pence and three farthings upon each of the men of the king; and the like amount upon each one of the white men: the king is valued at as much as eight men, because as much is played with him as with the eight men. And the half of that is the worth of the throw-board of an uchelwr.

150. The three mute tongues of the court: if a person commit a wrong in the court upon one of the three principal festivals, after general protection shall have been announced to all in the court; and after committing the wrong obtain protection from one of the officers of the court; and, on that day, the person who has received the wrong seek redress; the law says, that he is not to have it, and the officer from whom protection has been obtained, is not to enforce it for him; and that from the privilege of the day: and on that account they are called the three mute tongues of the court.

151. If a boneddig with patrimony go to serve an uchelwr, and remain for a space with him; and he be killed while in the service of the uchelwr; the uchelwr is to have three kine for homicide on his account: others say he is to have six kine for him: and, if he be living, he may go from the uchelwr when he will; excepting that he is to quit the uchelwr in the manner mentioned in the law of Howel: and such is called a car-fractured one; that is, a person who may be car-departing when he will. Fractured, in old Welsh, is shattered; that is, car-shattered.

[CASUALTIES.

I. MISCELLANEOUS.]

1. If there be two women walking, and no one with them, and two men meet them and ravish them; they are not to be compensated. If there be one with them, although ever so little, unless in arms; they lose none of their right.

2. If a man take a woman clandestinely, and keep her with him, without doing her right, until the end of seven days; until the end of the year he is not to do her right; then, however, she is to have the whole of her right.

3. Whoever shall fell an oak on the king's way, let him pay three kine camlwrw to the king; and, when the king goes by, let him hide the butt of the tree with unicoloured cloth; and let him pay the worth of the tree; and let him clear the way for the king.

4. If it be supposed that every son is a son of sufferance that shall be said to be a son to a man; the law says, that there is no son by sufferance, but a son lawfully affiliated by his mother, who, although not received, is not denied; and, because not denied, is suffered: and such cannot be denied when he may commit a crime, until it be compensated.

5. Some say, that the relics and utensils of a church are not to be sworn to; the law says, that they are; and that the community and the parsons are to swear to them, for, as they are the owners of the church, they are to swear to them: although the relics may be in the custody of laics and lost, the parsons are to swear to them.

6. Every alltud who shall share with a lord, is to have a share of buildings, because he is to have the one half.

7. A judge of a cymwd is not to be a pleader in his own case, nor is he to engage one; no one but the lord appoints him.

8. If a thing possessed by two persons in common be lost, and one of them light upon it, and mind to swear to it, and the defendant say, that no one is to swear but the owner of the whole; the law says, that he can swear to it.

9. If a person buy an animal from another, and afterwards find that it has teeth wanting, and mind to have compensation; the law says, that he is not to have compensation, for it is a blemish without the skin, because where neither flesh nor skin is broken, it is a blemish without the skin.

10. If a person dispute as to for what least a camlwrw is imposable; the law says, a camlwrw is imposable for the least matter that shall be sued for.

11. If a person inform of theft, saying that he saw the theft committed, and deny it; let him give the oaths of twenty-four men, without a bondman, without an alltud, without a nod-man; if that be not had, it can be brought against him.

12. An alltud is not to take a wife without his lord's leave; if he do, let his lord revenge it: if she be a "Cymraes," and have children, they belong to the lord, if their mother originated from the land of the lordship.

13. If a raith be imposed upon a thief, and be required to be of his kin, and "they deny; it is permitted him unless it can be proved against him: and it is proved by joint kin, with an oath that they are so near of kin as to pay and receive galanas along with him.

17. If a youth kill a person, or injure his limb, or do wrong to him, he pays for the whole of the injuries excepting saraad; for saraad cannot be done by him, or done to him: and he is not 'considered a man' until fourteen years of age.

18. If a person swear to inseparable property in another person's hand, by finding part of it to swear to, and not the whole, and it cannot be produced at the swearing; the law there says, where part is had to swear to, the whole is to be had: inseparable property is, if a person might lose an ox, and find part of the ox to swear to, he there is to have the whole.

19. If a person lose separable property, such as silver, or animals; although he might lose such kind of things, and find only one penny, or its worth, to swear to, no more is adjudged to him than he found to swear to; for it is separable property.

20. If a person suppose it not to be free for every one to pursue fish in the ocean; it is free to pursue them while alive: after they die, and are cast by the sea on the land, they belong to the lord of the country until the third flow and the third ebb; thenceforward they are 'to come' to the person who shall find them dead.

21. If a person owe a debt with surety upon it, and, when the debt shall be demanded, the defendant say, that he had paid the debt to him, and that he is not to answer to free the surety by another way, and for that intent produce evidences, and, at the time they are to come forward, they fail him; and, afterwards, the defendant seek to deny the surety, or by other arddelw to divest his suretiship, he cannot: for the law says, that with whatsoever arddelw a person shall commence before the judge, and the first judgment be given as to the arddelw, the arddelw is binding, whether 'retarding or not; and, therefore, he is not to deny surety, for he avouched by another arddelw previously.

23. If gold, or silver, or animals, or drowned property, be found in a wear, and the owner of the wear suppose that property to be his from being found in his lawful occupation upon his patrimony; the law says, that it is not, because a wear is lawful only for catching fish, and he has no permission to catch any thing but fish in it; and, therefore, nothing found in it, besides fish, is his property.

24. If another person's animal go into a buck-stall, or into a pit-fall, the person who made it is to compensate the injury which may befall the animal; and so if men go into them: unless a mark be put upon them, to wit, a cross on each side; and if so, an injury which may happen to men in the day-time is not to be compensated; but the mischance which may befall an animal is to be compensated, as they have not the sense to avoid them.

25. If a person make a pit-fall, he is, when hunting is done, to fill it: if he do not fill it, let him pay for the injury occasioned by it to men and animals.

26. If a person buy a cow from another with surety for her teithi, and she bull in the first year, and have a calf and milk; although she may be ever after bulling, the person from whom she came is not answerable for her teithi.

27. 28. If a person owe property to another, and he deny not the debt, only saying that he has nothing; and the claimant say, that he can prove that he has property, which he denies; the law says, that it is more right to credit the person who shall disown any property than he who may seek to prove that he has: after he shall deny, however, the lord is to have all.

29. If a person enter into co-tillage with another, and one of them, afterwards, break the co-tillage; it is right for the lord to enforce the keeping of the co-tillage; and a camlwrw to the lord; and his tith to the co-tiller.

30. If a bondman commit homicide of whatever kind; it is right for the lord of the bondman to pay for the deed of his bondman, as for a murderer, for he is a murderer.

31. If a person suppose that he is not to sit lawfully, nor give surety for abiding law, on the day he is ³¹to give an answer to the claim made upon him, as seeking time for aid, or through privilege, or other thing, and refuse; and it be said, in answer to him: 'The time that thou seekest thou art not to have by law, and, unless law says thou art to have it, thou shalt not have it; and to the law I appeal, that such person as shall seek time for aid is to bind himself in law, and shall not have it unless he ought by law.' The law says, that it is right for him to sit lawfully, and bind himself in the law to seek time for aid in the law, although it is right for him to bind himself to give an answer to the claim on the day he shall seek the time; for the law says, whatsoever day the judges are to be placed, the parties are to be placed, for a judge cannot pronounce a sentence but upon a person who shall bind himself in law, and shall be obedient, or disobedient, or a refuser of law, and leave the field illegally, or shall not appear in the field although summoned; and upon such a judgment of absence can be pronounced. There are times in which judges cannot be placed, as at high festivals, or night, or time when the law may be closed for land and soil; and as judges cannot be placed at those times, so parties cannot be placed before them.

32. If two persons seek law from a judge, whether they go by agreement or not to seek a decision at the blank days, or such times; the ³²judge is not to pronounce any sentence for them, but extrajudicially to tell them that law is not to be prosecuted at such times.

33. If dadenhudd be adjudged to a person, whose father was not lawfully seated upon land and soil, and afterwards, another person agitate a claim for dadenhudd upon him; the law says, the first dadenhudd destroys the other, and it is not right to adjudge dadenhudds upon one another.

If a person take a thing by violence from another, and then the person from whom the spoil is taken¹ settle, and remove the thing from the robber without his leave, and without asking, and the robber call for it to his custody in the condition it previously was; the law says, as the spoil did not legally revert to him, that it was lawful for it to go a second time into the robber's custody: if the² lord will the spoil,³ the law is open to his claim.

35. A cause to be heard is, one in which loss or gain is claimed on the day it ought.

36. A cause not to be heard is, one formerly between two persons, in which neglect by one of the parties, or settlement between them occurred.

37. A cause to be heard is, one in which no decision was formerly made; that it is right to hear, although it be not right to answer. That is not to be answered, unless there be brought against it time for aid if due, or privilege, or thing which requires delay.

38. A cause without delay is, a cause in which loss or gain occurs; and to that there can be no delay, nor ought not.

39. If a person claim a thing from another through surety, and the debtor deny the surety, and the judge sentence a¹ raith upon the debtor, and take surety for his fee from both parties, and there be a dispute between the two parties who shall pay the judge's fee; the law says, as the debtor cannot have a raith after his innocence is decided, he is to pay the judge's fee: if he gets the raith, it is he doubtless that pays: and so as to other raiths the like is said.

40. If a person pledge his faith to another, and the person to whom it is given complain of saraad, and willeth to have right; and the person who pledged his faith to the other say: 'I totally deny it, neither shame nor saraad did I cause thee, only pledged my faith upon thee; and to the law I appeal, that it is not saraad to any one to pledge faith upon him.' peal, that it is no pledging of faith but in the other's hand, and not in my hand didst thou pledge thy faith, but on my shoulder, or on my breast, or in a place where thou oughtest not.' The law there says, that there is no pledge of faith but a 'briduw, and that it was not more lawful to strike him with his open hand than with his closed hand, and that it is saraad if complained of; for it is certain that the prosecution is in his mouth, and his weapon in his hand to kill.

41. These persons are lawfully to be certain witnesses in the session of the lord, or the person who may be in his place: the judge and the two elders who shall be on each side of the king or lord. Whoever engage in law in the presence of those persons, and the two parties testify to them of proceedings done before them after the parties shall have spoken, and one of the parties seek to object to them, they cannot, for there is no objection concerning their judgment with a stranger; for every person, in law, is to be in his presence and theirs, the witnesses spoken of: and a husband and wife; and free and bond: and they are certain witnesses as to what they do to restore the right; and, if they be doubted, let every one of them be put to the relic except the lord.

42. If bees come to another person's skep, and eat the honey, and the owner of the honey willeth to be compensated by the owner of the bees which devoured the honey; the law says, that he is to have no compensation, because whatever animal the owner is not to attend or guard, he is not to compensate its damage or deed, such as bees, or a wild animal tamed, or a bird.

43. If a person's bees go into another person's skep, and remain with the hive, and the owner of the bees call for their restoration, and willeth to have them; the law there says, he is not to swear to them without a skep, and as he cannot swear to them, and they cannot be distinguished, he cannot, by law, recover them from the owner of the skep; for he did nothing illegal with them, and their annoyance was not less than their benefit.

45. If a powerful person compel a weak person to give security for something ¹to his damage' in the absence of law, for fear of arms, or for fear of ²spoliation; such ³fear stands in the law.

46. If a person owe a thing to another, with surety thereon, and the debtor refuse to pay; it is right for the surety to give a pledge ⁴of the defendant ⁴to the plaintiff.'

47. If he shall not find property equal in amount to the pledge on that day; let him, the next or the following day, give as much as shall make a legal pledge for the thing the first day he gave it.

48. If the defendant suppose that he is not to add to a pledge, but abide by the first he gave; the law says, that he is surety for the last penny as well as for the first; and, therefore, he is to complete his pledging for that debt.

49. If there be a dispute between the owners of two maenors as to meers, the highest in privilege is to meer; if they be equal, the conservancy of a lord shall meer.

suppose that he is to punish the person for the illegality he did in the time of the lord who died ; he is not, because he is only to punish for what shall be done in his own time.

54. If a person do an illegality in the time of a lord, and for that illegality the lord impose sureties for penalty, and, before the time of payment, the lord die ; the succeeding lord is to enforce the payment, for that was a debt to the father.

55. If a thief be banished, or cast off, or get sanctuary, and flee to another kingdom ; and the lord of that kingdom seek to punish him for the theft committed by him in the former place ; no lord is to punish but for what shall be done in his own kingdom.

56. If a person give a surety to prosecute theft against another person, and, on the day the cause is to be heard, recede from the prosecution of the theft against that person ; it is right to sentence him to three kine camlwrw for receding from the prosecution.

61. If it be supposed that a lord cannot, by law, give land to another inheritor, from the supposition that nobody is to have other than his own due; the law says, that the lord there can compress the two things into one, until provision come to an inheritor from his own property, and that without spoliation: and so as to other property.

62. If a person claim property from another during military service, he is not to answer him while he shall be in the king's service.

63. If a person on military service offer payment to another, he is not to take it unless he will; because nobody is liable to dirwy while on military service, lest the lord's service be prejudiced or hindered.

64. If a person's cow be taken by theft, or surreption, with her calf, and the cow and the calf be spent, and it become imperative to repay her worth; and the owner of the cow suppose that he is to have three score pence for the cow, and six pence for the calf; the law says, that he is not, for half the worth of every clean animal is its teithi, and the calf and the milk are part of her teithi; and, therefore, her worth is not more, although the calf be taken, than if she had been taken alone, and that is three score pence.

65. If a person owe property to another, with surety thereon, and the claimant say that he is to have twenty-four pence, and the defendant say that it is twelve pence, and it be left to the surety to decide, and the surety say: 'God knows,' says he, 'although it does not recur to your memory for what I was given as surety, it does to mine, to wit, for six pence.' The law there says, as he did not agree with either of the two assertions, he did not fulfil the teithi of a surety, and for that cause let him pay the whole claimed by the claimant over what the defendant acknowledged.

66. If a person fell immoveable timber, and it fall upon another person's land, or heap stones upon the land, and the owner of it willeth them to be cast from his land; the law says, that no one is to cause a nuisance to another, and that he is to

67. If a person be adjudged to have spear penny, let him begin to collect it before the end of a year and a day; and, unless he ask it during that period, he is not to ask it thenceforward, if he be in the country.

68. Whatsoever claim shall be adjudged to a person by law, and he shall not take possession of the claim, nor master it for a year and a day; the law says, that that causes an intervention between him and his property, if he be in the country, and the guardian is not to answer him thence out.

69. If persons find prizes on the road, or wandering animals, or other property without an owner; it is right for the one who shall find them to apprise the lord's servant, and then it is right for the lord to enquire to whom they may belong at three resorts; and, if it be not known to whom they may belong in that space, it is free for the king to make use of them thenceforward: for all property without an owner is the king's waste.

70. If a person commit an accessory to ferocious theft, ¹⁸he pays a twofold dirwy, that is, six pounds, or twenty-four kine.

71. If a person commit ferocious theft, and that of a thing of less worth than four pence; it is right to adjudge him to be a saleable thief, and that twofold, that is, fourteen pounds.

72. If saraad be done to a serving bondman, twenty-four pence is his saraad: a serving bondman is one who shall be in the house of an uchelwr who goes not to spade, nor quern: such is a domestic bondman, one who shall remain by invitation, without buying, with an uchelwr: his worth is the same as the worth of a bought bondman.

73. If a person appraise a thing, which has a legal worth thereon, and the appraisal be more than the legal worth; judges are to see whether it be wrongly appraised, and if it be wrongly done, he is to pay the penalty of perjury, that is, a camlwrw of ²⁸nine score pence, and the church after him.

74. If a man do wrong to the worth of one penny while in sanctuary, and a relic upon him; he is to lose the whole of his property on account of that sanctuary, unless he obtain a new sanctuary; because, the sanctuary whose privilege he broke is not to renew it.

75. If a person be adjudged to be a saleable thief, and have property to buy himself; the law is, where a person shall refuse to save his soul from death, and he able to do so and willeth not, he is to be executed for the theft: if he were not able to buy himself, although his kindred might fail to buy him, he is not to be executed for the property he might not compass, although due from him.

76. If two owners come, and swear separately to property in the hands of the same person, in the same suit; it is right to leave him his arddelw to either he willeth of them, and, if his arddelw stand to him, let him be free, and, if his arddelw fail him to the one, although he may be innocent of the other, let him be executed; if the theft be of that amount that he ought to lose his life. If his arddelw fail him to both, let him lose his life for the one, as the lord's punishment; and let his property, as far as seven pounds, be forfeited for the other, as punishment: and there is the one case the lord is to have the life, and the property, of the thief.

77. If a person shall not know for what least a camlŷrw is due; the law says, that it is due for the least thing that shall be complained of, that is, a penny in law if illegally taken, and not restored until complained of in court.

78. If it chance to be supposed by a lord that he is to have property for surreption although not complained of; the law says, he is not, unless a plaint be preferred by the loser to the court: after the loser shall complain, he is not to receive the property back, nor any thing for it, without the consent of the lord.

79. Whoever shall hold land and soil for a year and a day, with military service, and tourn, and tax, and every thing incident to it; and another owner come, and ask for his share of it; he is to pay to the guardian the conservancy fee for land.

80. If a person promise property to another to injure his relative, or his neighbour, such as burning his buildings, or killing his animals, or killing a person, and give surety for that property, and he do the crime; and the person refuse to pay the property; and the person who did the crime sue the surety for the property; it is right for him to name for what he is surety, and for what cause : if he be doubted by the two parties, let the *claimant be prosecuted, and let him pay himself what property he promised, and a twofold camlwrw to the lord. Others say, that a twofold dirwy is there due ; for it is an accessory of theft, and that this is theft, and waylaying ; and the twofold dirwy is on account of the waylaying, and that form is the best : and the man who did the crime to lose his life, and the surety free from his suretiship, and the debtor not to pay ; for that claim was secured contrary to law, and nothing done contrary to law is effective : there it is said, a surety without enforcement ; and a debtor without payment, although the claim shall be acknowledged ; and the claimant executed.

81. If a person buy a thing from another, with surety for its dilysrwydd, and, afterwards, a person come to question that property, and say, it was taken without justice, without right, and take it away ; and the guardian come to the surety, and require him to secure that property to him, and then the surety say : ' I secure not defence against violence, and thy property was taken by violence, and is not in thy custody ; and, therefore, I secure not that property to thee until it return to thy custody.' Law says, a surety is not to uphold his suretiship against violence, and theft, nor against surreption, nor spoliation, nor many other things, until it return to the hands from whence it was taken ; the surety, afterwards, is to uphold it, in the face of whoever shall claim, as the law shall adjudge best.

82. If there be a suit between two men for land and soil, and the judge, in that suit, pass a wrong sentence, and, on that account, the claimant call for investiture of the land ; and the defendant say : ' God knows, a wrong sentence was passed upon me, and here is my pledge that it is a wrong sentence ; and to the law I appeal, that investiture of my land is not to be given until the sentence be certain, as I appear against it where I ought ;' and the judge in his judgment seat. ' God knows,' answers the claimant, ' law has here been by the union of two parties, and lord, and judge, and my land has been adjudged to me by law ; and to the law I appeal, that investiture is to be of what the judge adjudged to me.' The law says, that where-ever the custody was when the law was commenced, the custody is not to be changed until the sentence be certain, as it was disputed at the lawful time; if it had not been disputed when the judge was in his judgment seat, and the sentence acquiesced in until the parties and the lord be dispersed; the lord is to give investiture to the claimant after that, although the sentence might be wrong, and although warranted.
